With all the intricate problems affecting the United States Treasury and the financial conditions and situations the country encountered at various periods he was particularly familiar, and in their mastery there were but few his superiors. His knowledge of the many questions affecting coinage, banking, and currency was profound and acquired after long study and great research. His advice on such subjects was sought by business men of the country and accepted by them. His reputation as a statesman and a legislator he earned, and no part of it was the result of chance. He stumbled on nothing, and the place he won in this House and elsewhere resulted from his industry, combined with his sound judgment on all subjects, and the exercise of his good common sense.

Mr. BROSIUS was an intensely patriotic man, and many of his public speeches exhibit great love of country. His style of composition was pleasing to his hearers, and whether at a camp fire of his comrades, recalling war memories, or in the presence of an audience whose tastes were critically intellectual, he was always interesting and instructive. As a public speaker he was in almost constant demand, and his obliging disposition induced him to accept many invitations, thus loading him with additional labors and greatly increasing in number his imperative obligations.

My late colleague was a devoted Republican in politics. He was always found with the organization of his party. His political sagacity was oftentimes drawn upon by Republican leaders and his counsels as often prevailed. His wisdom as a leader and his constant and determined declarations for improvement in public affairs; his example as a public man serving in public places, together with his advocacy of the creed he sincerely believed in; his commendation of the right and his condemnation of wrong, have been valuable contributions toward Republican supremacy in Pennsylvania. His arguments for what he believed to be right were full of logic and power and carried with them conviction. From my earliest recollection of the public men of Pennsylvania, MARRIOTT BROSIUS has been one of the most prominent in every movement for the good of the State, and his death leaves a place vacant which is difficult to fill.

The domestic life of my friend was a model of simplicity and chastity, and devotedly constant without pretense to display or demonstration. He avoided both public and private vulgarity, but scrupulously observed the conventionalities of life with modesty and decorum. He came from plain, unassuming, God-loving people, whose ambitions never tempted them beyond the ways that led to their orderly business and their adopted church. His religion was that of his fathers, which, from the time of George Fox to the present, has taught simplicity, sincerity, truthfulness, and honor and impressed upon the children of men the advantage to be spiritually derived by walking humbly in the sight of their Master. "He was much better and wiser than a common man."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not often take part in such ceremonies as engage our attention to-day. I am not able to rid myself of the feeling on the one hand that they are perfunctory when one speaks only from a sense of duty, from his head and not from his heart, and on the other hand inadequate when one would speak of his friend. In the latter case there is the limitation of publicity, the fear that the language of eulogy may be regarded, as it too often in fact is, the language of extravagance. But this occasion may not pass without my bringing my humble tribute to the memory of my friend BROSIUS; for he was my friend.

Entering public life almost at the same time, I in the Fiftieth and he in the Fifty-first Congress, our careers, as to time, have run upon parallel lines. How much he was for twelve years of the life of this House and what he contributed of faithful and able service to his State and the nation I personally know. But I know more than that. I know of his high character, his pure and exemplary life, his affectionate disposition, and the courage with which he hewed to the line wherever duty called.

The first time that I ever saw him was when he appeared as a delegate in the Pennsylvania State convention, in 1882. I also was a delegate in that convention, charged with the duty of placing a fellow-member of the Allegheny County bar in nomination for a justiceship on the bench of the supreme court. Mr. BROSIUS'S speech in that convention, nominating his friend, Judge Livingstone, electrified his hearers. It was graceful, forceful, eloquent; and when subsequently Thomas M. Marshall, of Pittsburg, declined the nomination for Congressman at large, for which he had been slated, there was no thought of any other as the standard bearer of his party than MARRIOTT BROSIUS. True, he made a losing fight: but the fault was not his, but his party's.

The slight acquaintance that we then formed was renewed when he came here as a member of the Fifty-first Congress, and from that time forward increased in intimacy until the time of his death. That. it will be recollected, was one of the stormiest Congresses in our history. It was the Congress in which, under the leadership of the greatest of all our parliamentarians, Thomas B. Reed, a new order of things was inaugurated and the principle established, never to be overturned, that the quorum of the Constitution in this House is a present and not a voting quorum.

In the memorable contests of that trying period Mr. BROSIUS bore his full share. He was a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and was specially prominent in reporting and taking charge of a bill upon the subject of lard, which was of special interest to his farmer constituents. He was also a member of the Committee on Militia and on Private Land Claims. He did not, however, confine himself to the subjects in charge of his several committees. With unwearying industry he examined and addressed the House upon a wide range of topics, amongst others, pensions, the tariff, silver, and immigration, Though a newcomer in the forum, he soon became a conspicuous figure therein.

In the Fifty-second Congress, which was Democratic, Mr. BROSIUS was a member of the Committees on Banking and Currency, on Labor, and on Civil-Service Reform, and, though a member of the minority party, continued to occupy a prominent place in the deliberations of the House. He was heard from upon our policy with respect to the Indians, upon pensions, and especially upon the subject of tariff and silver.

It would serve no good purpose for me to catalogue in detail the subjects treated of by our friend during the various Congresses of which he was a member subsequent to this. When the Republican party again came into possession of the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress Mr. BROSIUS became again a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and chairman of the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, in which positions he continued through the Fifty-fifth Congress. In the Fifty-sixth Congress he realized a cherished ambition in succeeding to the chairmanship of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

It was during that Congress that the present currency law went upon the statute book and the gold standard was adopted. It will be seen from the various committees upon which he served that Mr. BROSIUS'S public services covered a wide field. His career, however, is most conspicuously identified with the currency question and his uniform earnest and able efforts in the cause of sound money. He was, too, a faithful champion of the merit system and its unfailing defender on the floor of the House.

If we should confine ourselves to his services in the House alone we should miss a great part, and an interesting part, of his career. He was a much sought campaigner in every party contest, a bright after-dinner speaker, a cultured and scholarly lecturer, and one whose addresses on economic questions were in demand before bankers and other societies in many parts of the Union.

It is not because of his public services, however, that I like to think of MARRIOTT BROSIUS. I like, rather, to recall what he was than to recall what he did—though what he did he did because he was what he was. He was a typical self-made American; a living demonstration of the possibilities of American citizenship. And yet there are many such, whose characters exhibit the industry, the courage, the adaptability to circumstances, the aggressiveness that bring fame and fortune, but who do not have the finer qualities that adorn character in its highest reach.

Mr. BROSIUS was an exemplary Christian gentleman, of pure life and lofty purpose, loyal to duty in every avenue of life, and, besides, a scholar of unusual culture and accomplishment. Of fine presence, possessed of a resonant voice and choice command of language. he was an orator of mark, and delighted in public speaking. His style was ornate; he was fond of the rhetorical. He once told me that it was his habit whenever he came across a sentence or a paragraph that pleased him, in prose or in verse, to copy it, and that he had accumulated several volumes filled with such quotations. He had a splendid memory. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that his speeches abound in wit and anecdote, in historical allusion, and in words of wisdom gathered from many sources.

He was a clear thinker, a cogent reasoner. He was an industrious man, spending not much time in play; and yet there was nothing about him of reserve or moroseness. He was bright and cheery as the day and apparently always happy.

Of good Quaker stock, there was yet war in his blood for the right, and when the cloud burst in 1861, the cloud of civil war, he shouldered his musket and throughout a long career of military life encountered all the hardships of a soldier's life. It was his fortune to face death on many a field of blood and to come back to the pursuits of peace bearing in his body wounds of battle never to be healed.

He was a good lawyer, loyal to court and to client, and delaying no man's cause for lucre or malice.

He had other qualities to which we may only in general terms refer. Of what he was as husband and father, only those whom he loved and who loved him could adequately speak. To the depths of their sorrow we may not penetrate; upon that ground, sacred, we may not tread.

Suffice it to know that he who in all his relations with his fellow-men was without stain must also have been, as we know he was, chiefest of the loving and the loved in the home circle.

Citizen, soldier, lawyer, statesman, husband, and father; pure, able, faithful, the record of his life is secure. Being dead, he yet speaketh.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, the first sentence written by the most illustrious general of the war of the rebellion in his preface to his classical memoirs is this: "Man proposes and God disposes." Fortunate it is for human kind and for the world that there is a supreme, all-wise and all-loving Being to shape and direct the course of man. Fortunate, also, is it that that Being hides from us the day and the hour when we are to go hence. If man knew from the beginning what and when was to be his ending, it is hardly possible for us to conceive what kind of a world we would have here on earth. All laudable selfishness and ambition would be destroyed. In youth we would not lay the foundation so deep and broad upon which to build our future action. It is questionable whether man himself would be much superior in point of intellect and energy to the animals about him.

In youth we prepare ourselves for manhood and for the duties which devolve upon us as members of our complex civilization.

In manhood we build substantial and lasting buildings. We construct railroads and canals. We enter into business affairs which long outlast the life of every man originally engaged in them. We legislate for ourselves and for generations to follow. To me this seems to indicate that we possess a spark of that life given to us from above, which is to last through the countless ages. In the language of the poet—

> The thoughts we are thinking, our fathers would think;
> From the death we are shrinking from, they, too, would shrink;
> To the life we are clinging to, they, too, would cling—
> But it speeds from the earth like a bird on the wing.

The man in whose memory the House of Representatives is holding these exercises was born and lived and died as other men. He was a product of our own country, and in his veins flowed the blood of ancestors that had come to the new world to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience and to enjoy civil and religious liberty. In his youth he attended the public school, the great kindergarten of democracy, and thus early in life he came into personal contact with the boys and girls who were soon to become the future men and women of the Republic. The public school is the bulwark of our liberty, and is the proper place to send, in early life, every boy and girl in our land. The private school later on has a place to fill in the needs of education, but in the early stages no school can so best equip a boy and girl for future usefulness as the public school.

The fact that Mr. BROSIUS attended the public school in his early youth gave to him much of the success which attended him in later life. It is there that one learns self-control and self-independence and also learns to give and take in the struggle of life. It is there that the spirit of patriotism and of liberty is taught which later on develops so strongly in the American people. When the call from Father Abraham came for men to preserve the Union, Mr. BROSIUS offered himself. He enlisted as a private soldier and went forth to do and to die, if need be, for his country's preservation. He was found in the thickest of the fight, contending against the most valiant foe that ever confronted an opposing army. It was an American fighting an American, and the world has never seen, since the dawn of history, such courage and brain pitted against courage and brain. By sheer bravery and merit and not through favoritism he rose from the ranks to the position of a second lieutenant. In one of the severest engagements of the war he was wounded, and felt its effects and bore in his person that wound up to the moment of his passing away. For four years in legislative life here in Congress I was closely associated with him, and during all that time I never heard him tell of the part he took or what he did or how he was wounded in that fierce fratricidal war. Has it not often been your observation, Mr. Chairman, that the real man, whether in peace or war, never tells of the deeds that he has done and the works that he has accomplished?

When the war was over Mr. BROSIUS, like thousands of others, cheerfully returned to the pursuits of peace, and at once entered upon a course of study which would the better fit him for usefulness as a citizen. He read law and was admitted to the bar. He passed through the usual struggles and trials which attend young men in this profession. He easily and naturally drifted into political life, and we find him at last elected as a member of the Fifty-first Congresses. He was elected successively a member of the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. I entered the Fifty-fourth Congress, and it was then that I first made his acquaintance. I knew him but slightly during that Congress. From the time that I first became acquainted with him in that Congress until its close, I now recall with pleasure the very kind and considerate treatment that he was wont to accord to new members.

It was in the Fifty-fifth Congress that I was assigned by the Speaker to the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which he was a member, that I began to know the true worth of this good man. He was attentive to his committee duties and was always very cordial to and considerate of every member of the committee. He was an attendant upon the sessions of the House, and he took an active part in the discussion of public affairs. In the Fifty-sixth Congress he became chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. His kindly disposition and his scholarly attainments won for him the affection of every member of the committee over which he presided.

I recall now, as if it were but yesterday, the closing scene in the Banking and Currency Committee when we parted at the close of the Fifty-sixth Congress. One after another of the retiring members of the committee addressed the committee and made their farewell speeches. I remember vividly how, speaking for the minority, the gallant ex-Confederate soldier, Col. W. JASPER TALBERT, of South Carolina, spoke eloquently and feelingly of the high regard and esteem that he had for the impartial and manly chairman, Mr. BROSIUS. Then I remember also how a distinguished and learned member of the committee, Mr. HILL, of Connecticut, gave expression of the high esteem and regard which the majority of the committee had for their much-liked chairman. Then other retiring members of the committee added their word of respect and esteem, and then there came a hush in the proceedings. Our good chairman, Mr. BROSIUS, then arose and feelingly and eloquently thanked the committee for their kind words spoken and for their high regard for him. Little did we think on that occasion that it was a farewell meeting. We parted with friendly grasp of the hand, and he wished each of the reelected members a pleasant summer and a safe return to the opening of the Fifty-seventh Congress. We all returned to the Fifty-seventh Congress save he alone.

I have met him in legislative halls. I have met him in the committee room. I have met him at the social functions. I have met him at the banquet table. At no time and at no place did I ever hear a word fall from his lips that would not be proper to say in his own parlor and in the presence of his own family. In religious belief he was a member of the Society of Friends. The rest of us would take the oath of office. He would not. He was true to the tenets of his peculiar religion. Almost alone, he would stand at the bar of the House and say, "I do solemnly affirm." He was a faithful follower of the Master, and he lived the life of a Christian. He has gone from us. His earthly life is ended. His deeds will remain. The influence of his life will be felt and will impress for good lives yet unborn. Good men die; their good deeds live forever. In the passing away of Mr. BROSIUS I have lost a dear, good friend. His wife has lost a faithful husband. His children have lost a devoted father. Pennsylvania has lost an honored Representative in Congress. The nation has lost a brave defender and a worthy citizen.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, occasions like this always bring us closer together. While you often hear the words here, "On this side or the other side of the House," we are all on this occasion on the same side, with a feeling of sympathy, sorrow, and friendship. "In the midst of life we are in death." Often in the fitful pauses of busy life we are called upon to solemnly reflect upon the departure of relatives, friends, and associates, and now, in accordance with a time-honored custom, we pause in our proceedings to-day and turn aside from the cares and turmoils of political discussions to pay our last respects to one of our lamented coworkers and to pay humble tribute to his worth. It has been said that to eulogize a departed friend and comrade is to speak kindly of him and his character. Sometimes, it may be, too much is said; but, on the other hand, too little may be said. But it is not likely that too much can be said of a man with a character like that of Congressman BROSIUS. He was truly an honest man—"the noblest work of God." He was a man of great capabilities and lofty ambition. Death under any condition is sad, but peculiarly so was his death. Just as he had entered the field of what appeared to be his greatest usefulness he was cut down like the flower of the field that to-day blooms and gives out its fragrance to all around it and to-morrow is gone.

After the adjournment of the Fifty-sixth Congress, I had been at my home in South Carolina about two weeks when one evening about twilight, sitting around my fireside with my family, a telegram was handed to me. Breaking it open, to my surprise it was a notice from the Sergeant-at-Arms that I had been appointed by the Speaker to attend the funeral ceremonies of the late Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, of Pennsylvania, at his home in Lancaster. A feeling of deep sadness and sorrow overshadowed me, and intensified it was, as the circumstances surrounding me at that time prevented me from attending and paying him that last homage. As I sat there, many memories of his manly form, his pleasant manners, and benevolent face came trooping back to my mind. I thought of him as I saw him at our last meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which he was the honored chairman, just before the expiration of the Fifty-sixth Congress, as he sat at the head of the table in the committee room, and I could hardly realize that he was dead. Yet it was only too true.

While only in the noonday of his great usefulness and service to his country, he was stricken down. At that last meeting of the committee, only about three weeks before his death, I had the pleasure, as has been said by one of the speakers to-day, Mr. PRINCE, of Illinois, of offering on behalf of the committee a resolution of thanks to Chairman BROSIUS for his uniform kindness, courtesy, and impartiality to the members of the committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress. I put the question, and it was carried feelingly and unanimously after many seconds around the table. Resolutions of regret had also been offered and carried in regard to several retiring members of the committee. I shall never forget the very feeling manner in which he arose from his seat and responded to the sentiment. Hard-hearted you may say Congressmen are toward each other, but on that occasion there were very few, if any, dry eyes around that table at the close of that episode.

I first met Mr. BROSIUS when I came to Washington, at the beginning of the Fifty-third Congress, and from the first time I met him I felt drawn to him by a kind of uncontrollable magnetism, and as time wore on I became more attached to him, notwithstanding he belonged to one political faith and I to another. While I was an uncompromising Democrat and he as much of a Republican, yet I always felt whenever I met him and clasped his hand that I had met an honest, conscientious man; one who though differing widely with his fellow-man was ready to accord to him honesty of purpose while claiming it for himself. In the Fifty-sixth Congress Speaker HENDERSON placed me on the Committee on Banking and Currency, where my esteem for him continued to grow.

There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that is certain, and that is death, while there is also nothing more uncertain than life. As said by his home paper on the morning after his untimely death, no more shocking exemplification of the uncertainty of life and the swiftness of death could have happened than the passing away of MARRIOTT BROSIUS.

> A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
> Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

It is hard to realize that the distinguished Congressman has passed from time into eternity and is no more. Methinks I can almost hear his voice even now reverberating around the walls of this Hall, and one can well imagine his robust form coming in to take his seat in his accustomed style on the other side of this Chamber. His associates over there will miss him, and we will miss him over here as well. Only the work he wrought and the life he lived remain as a monument to his memory, constituting a peculiar heritage for the emulation of struggling youth and for the sweet solace and comfort of his family and the people he served so well.

MARRIOTT BROSIUS, as he was familiarly known by his nearest friends, was a self-made man, going from the farm to the forum of national legislation. He was left an orphan at the age of 7 years, and was nearly 58 years old when he died. While yet on his father's farm he enlisted at the age of 18 in the early part of the civil war, and it is said by those who knew that his record as a soldier was one of which any man might well be proud. I say this notwithstanding I was a Confederate, and he a Federal, soldier. For bravery on the battlefield he was promoted and commissioned a lieutenant. His service in the Army was brought to a close at the battle of Green Plains, a most bloody and desperate encounter, in which he was disabled for life by a bullet smashing through his shoulder. As a lawyer he won success and forged to the front at the Lancaster bar. The Democratic papers of his city and district and State all spoke kindly and favorably of him as a man, as did his own Republican organs.

It was his nature to be fair and generous toward everybody. It is not my purpose to frame any formal epitaph, but it is for those who have known and loved him almost a lifetime to speak of his true life and service. But I want to say that, from an acquaintance of nine or ten years with him, I believe he was also a true soldier in civil life, a soldier of the Master, and when the final summons came he was not afraid, but, heroically as ever a Knight of the Cross, saluted with a stainless sword the spotless majesty of the risen Saviour, and bowed his head to death. Then why should we mourn? Our friend and brother is infinitely better off, and our loss, after all, is heaven's gain, for we have the assurance from all we can learn of him that he was a Christian man and not afraid to die, and in spite of his ambition to make a name for himself and to write it high on the roll of fame, he never forgot his God and his duty to Him.

But, rightly realizing that the real and true object of life is, after all, to prepare for death, he lived the life of a devoted Christian and simply fell asleep only to awake in a better land. And when we consider carefully his life and his remarkable career along with many others of a similar type, how he rose from obscurity to prominence, and that in spite of many obstacles and adverse circumstances, we are prone to acknowledge the truth of the little verse which says:

> Who hath not learned in hours of faith
> The truth, to flesh and sense unknown,
> That life is ever lord of death,
> And love can never lose its own.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS prior to the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress. At that time being upon the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which committee he was the honored, able, and efficient chairman, the opportunity was presented for me to know him quite intimately. I also had the good fortune to be at the same house and eat at the same table with Mr. BROSIUS for some considerable time. As I judged him he was a man of great simplicity of personal character. He seemed to pursue the even tenor of his way in this House among his many friends, and in the lofty walks of public life, unscathed by criticism, unslandered by adverse report. He was modest and sufficiently reserved, yet vigilant in asserting his rights and protecting the interests of those he represented. Always studious and industrious; attentive to substance as well as to taste in style. He was eloquent, logical, and forcible in debate. He was loyal to his convictions and friends. He despised hypocrisy, treachery, and ingratitude, whether in public or private life. He was not only intensely loyal to his State and district, which he never ceased or hesitated to praise with just pride, but he loved his party, its principles, and policies with an affection equaled by few. He was a party man, but would not permit his partisanship to becloud and bedim his patriotism.

In our strenuous American life, alive with the vast activities, the keen competitions, and the boundless aspirations that a free government stimulates in a land of opportunity, with new problems continually springing up for solution, we must of necessity dwell in perpetual conflict of opinion. Yet differences which invite debate must cease, results must be obtained, compromises must be made. In the committee room and on this floor Mr. BROSIUS was the great pacifier, who brought order out of chaos, peace and harmony out of disorder, and achieved results where others might have failed.

He was a diligent student; his reading took a wide range; he gleaned from every field of knowledge and possessed an aptitude of intelligence which made him a valuable acquisition to every social or professional circle. His devotion to his constituents was a conspicuous feature of his public life. He believed that the career of every successful public man teaches that the only way for a public servant to securely hold the confidence and affection of his constituents is in the demonstration of his worthiness by integrity, fidelity, and loyalty in their service.

I leave it to others more conversant with his ardent and useful life to speak of his public achievements in military and civic life, where he acquitted himself with great honor and distinction in positions other than that of an able, distinguished, and influential member of Congress for many years.

Why Mr. BROSIUS was cut off in the full tide of usefulness, before he had scarcely passed the meridian of life, in the full enjoyment of his cultured faculties, before the evening of life had come on, and while the fires of being yet burned with a steady glow, is a mystery that eternity alone will unvail to us. But death comes as the dread messenger of pain and sorrow; the rude foe to happiness; the maker of widows and orphans; that banishes hope and installs despair; that blots out sun and moon and stars, and brings around the sable clouds of rayless night. But, thanks to the good God above us, to us again appears and smiles the gentle moon, and again beam the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels.

In mourning now for him who has joined the throng who have gone before and are for a time lost to us in the mysterious abodes beyond our mortal sight, we must not grieve as those who are without hope. Certainly we should not be anxious about him whose Christian life was an illustrious example for right living. He has passed over the dark river which separates us from the heavenly country. He is only a little in advance and awaits our coming to join him as we enter into the unfathomed mysteries of eternity.

As one grows older and begins the descent toward the evening of life he comes to feel how little after all is the value of this brief span of life. We come, we tarry just a little while, and depart. The pleasures of living, the transitory joys of existence, thrilling and intense as they sometimes seem, are of little permanent value; the true worth of life is to be found in the opportunity it gives for the formation of character. The character which is formed by the experiences of our earthly existence, whether brief or long, makes us after all what we are, and alone goes on with us to the life beyond, thus making life worth the living, for it makes desirable immortality, which is the inalienable and indestructible birthright of every human soul.

If, then, our philosophy is correct, we ought not to mourn the loss of our friend. He lived long enough to form a noble, Christian character, fitting him for better than earthly service. He has gone a little before at his Master's call, to do his Master's service in a happier sphere, with clearer vision, with higher freedom and purer affections. What lesson then is there in this death and this memorial service for us who for a little time survive? Can it not be found in heeding the injunction:

> So live, that when thy summons comes to join
> The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,
> Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
> Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making any extended eulogy upon my dead comrade, whose memory we honor to-day, but rise more for the purpose of extending my thanks to his colleagues, who have already addressed the House in this connection, and who have presented the high character of the man, and his capacity and ability on the floor of the House and in connection with public affairs. Most of them knew him longer and more intimately than I. Most of them had a personal acquaintance with him better than mine, but I counted as one of the special privileges of my life the fact that I became acquainted with him and appreciated him as such a man must be appreciated by all those who know him.

When I was elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress I came to Washington about the conclusion of the preceding session of the Fifty-third Congress for the purpose of making the acquaintance of the members and familiarizing myself with the business of Congress. Mr. BROSIUS was the first member whose acquaintance I formed. We recognized each other as comrades by the button that we wore—the badge of the Grand Army. He asked my name and gave me his name and our acquaintance began. During my service in that Congress and afterwards I became intimately acquainted with him. He was my personal friend, and we served together upon the same committee. It is true that at times we differed as to the work of the committee. I remember well one case where we differed materially. I objected to a proposition pending in the committee which was advocated by him, upon which he had spent much labor. I joined with others who opposed the measure and endeavored to prevent it. I thought it likely that he would perhaps administer some rebuke or make some suggestion of the feeling that he entertained in reference to the matter when I afterwards met him. But instead of that there was the same kindly smile upon his face, the same warm hand was extended to me, and there was an assurance in his every act of the kindly feeling which had always animated him toward me.

And again, Mr. Speaker, long afterwards, after our acquaintance had ripened, and in another Congress, when I shook hands with him here in the Hall, a shadow of pain passed over his face, and I found that he was suffering from an injury which he had received during the war. He said: "My lame arm pains me greatly." I said: "Where were you wounded?" I intended to inquire at what battle. He put the other hand upon his shoulder and said: "I have lost this shoulder joint and it pains me severely this morning." We walked out in the corridor and had a little conversation about the place where it occurred, about the time when it happened, about his age and mine during the days of the great rebellion, and about the battle for the life of the nation, and I think he never spoke of his wound again. But I began to realize that it was something in connection with that wound that had made him so gentle and patient. It was something that had put him on guard against the passions of life; and recently, since this memorial day was appointed, I have endeavored to make some further inquiry concerning his service and the action in which he was wounded.

Nearly all the facts of his ancestry and of his own boyhood life that are known have been detailed to you by those who were acquainted with him and who had better sources of knowledge than I have; yet in my inquiry I found that the charge in which he was wounded was one of the most heroic of all the great charges that were made in the battle—the preservation of the life of the nation. More than once I have attempted to recite to my comrades some description of the charge of the First Minnesota Regiment at Gettysburg, when it was sent out for only about 250 yards with 287 men, and in a short few minutes left all but 34 of them strewn upon the ground. I have considered it one of the most costly charges ever made by a regiment of men. I found on investigating the charge in which my comrade was wounded at Green Plains that his regiment, a little less than 300 men, were ordered into a charge upon Pickett's division, consisting of 2,000 men, with less than 400 yards of ground to pass over.

By somebody's blunder they were not supported either by artillery or by flanking regiments. During the charge seven color bearers were shot down and the eighth one came back with the staff in two pieces and the flag riddled by over a hundred rebel bullets. They passed nearly to the rebel lines before the bugle sounded their recall. At that moment a minie ball struck MARRIOTT BROSIUS square in the breast and lodged in a little leather-covered diary in his breast pocket. As they turned to come back a wounded boy fell at his feet. He stooped to pick up the boy to carry him off, when another ball crashed through his shoulder and he fell. He was carried from the field and first taken to Point of Rocks, and then after a month was brought to the hospital at Baltimore. It was three months from the day he was shot until the wound was probed. The smashed and splintered bones were yet in the wound and it was in a terribly diseased condition. He lay upon one bed until the bones of his hip joint came through the flesh.

I want you to remember, my comrades and my colleagues, that he was then only a boy of 21 years, smooth faced, trained in the peaceful ways of a country farm in Pennsylvania, turned into a heroic soldier by three years of camps and marches and battles. He was a volunteer. He was a volunteer in answer to the call of Abraham Lincoln, which said:

> I appeal to all loyal citizens to favor, facilitate, and aid this effort to maintain the honor, the integrity, and the existence of our national Union and the perpetuity of popular government.

The volunteer knew the purpose for which he was fighting and suffering.

Three months of suffering and endurance of this terrible wound followed before finally some surgeon undertook the operation which removed the head of the humerus and removed both parts of the knuckle joint of the shoulder, leaving the arm connected only by the muscles. Under the operation, after so many months of suffering, he sank rapidly and was given up for dead, but his soul kept him alive.

It was the months of pain, and the going so near to the thin veil that separates us from the great hereafter, and staying there so long, that conquered the passions of life for him and gave him dominion over himself. It added to whatever gentleness of nature he had been endowed with from his birth. For him, as for all those who have endured great physical suffering, with a great moral purpose, there comes a majesty of life, a repose and dignity of character that can not forget itself upon any occasion or in any place. The gentle conventionalities that are acquired by the rest of us in our intercourse with our fellow-men came easily and naturally to him. They were a part of his nature.

In that little bullet-marked diary, which is a priceless relic in the family of this brave man, is this modest paragraph in his own handwriting:

> For the last six months I have neglected my diary on account of disability. I was wounded on the 20th of May. I have now recovered so far as to be able to resume my notes.

He was as modest as he was brave. In these lines he said all he had to say of his heroic self-sacrifice. He was kind, not only to his own, he was kind to all whom he could help.

I knew but little of his domestic relations. I had the pleasure of meeting but one member of his family besides himself, but the meeting occurred under such circumstances with him as revealed by a flash the peace and the love of a perfectly secure domestic home.

I need not add any testimony to the worth of his character, to the ability of his services to his State and to his country here as a member of Congress. I can not feel that death was an enemy to him or to me. I suffer pain whenever I lose a friend, but it is merely the pain of a separation. It is only sorrow for the loss of companionship. I miss the touch of the vanished hand and the voice that is hushed and still. I know, as he knows now in that home of peace where he is dwelling, that death is but the great majestic step by which we pass from labor to a life of glory and of peace; that it is not an enemy to those who have lived and labored, who have loved and suffered for country and for country's cause; that it is not an enemy to him who has lived for his fellow-men or who has died in their service. Thanks to the blessed Savior of men who has taught us to love and to serve, in obedience and in faith, there is now no sting in death and no victory in the grave. There is eternal life beyond. Our friend wears its crown.

Further than what I have now said, I only desire to ask the privilege of placing in the RECORD the testimonial of one who knew him far better than any of us—his teacher in his childhood, his teacher at the time he entered the Army, his beloved family physician, who was chosen by his own neighbors to deliver the address at the time of the memorial exercises at his own home.

When I wrote to inquire concerning some little data that I desired, I received the manuscript of this address. Reading it over it struck me that the kindest tribute I could give him would be to add this to the testimonials that his colleagues will place upon the RECORD.

Therefore I ask the privilege of placing in the RECORD this memorial address of Dr. J. W. Houston.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANDIS). Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Kansas will be complied with.

The address of Dr. Houston, referred to, is as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: Inspired by love, depressed with grief, I appear before you on this occasion. Unwritten fraternal law demands that we should observe the solemn rites due to our deceased brother, Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, LL. D., and to-day is the appointed time. But I am fully convinced that this precedent is not the actuating cause of your presence here to-day. Higher and nobler impulses have directed your footsteps to this sanctuary of patriotism on the present occasion. The love you bore our friend and brother, the homage his due, the veneration his life demands, and the adoration his history suggests are all impelling reasons why we should convene to-day to honor his memory and learn the lesson his patriotism imparts.

My selection to pronounce the words of the story of his life was not due to any ability on my part over and above that of many of the comrades, but alone to the fact that I knew him from his early boyhood, his family and his friends, and all the environments attending his earthly career, having shared his bed and board. Mr. BROSIUS was born in Colerain Township, Lancaster County, on the 7th of March, 1843, on the western bank of the East Branch of the Octorara. The old mansion yet retains the dignity of the farmhouse, and is now a place of historic interest to biographers, where—

"By sylvan dell through meadows green,
The flood of the East Branch is seen;
Around the brae through painted lea,
Seeking a passage to the sea.
The swelling tide flows ever on
By glen and brake, till race is won;
Where mingling with the salted wave,
Returns unto the springs which gave."

There, in one of the richest agricultural districts in southern Lancaster County, in a community composed of Friends and Free Presbyterians, all of whom were sailing on the advanced waves of progress and reform, on the physical, intellectual, and moral streams of life, the boyhood days of Mr. BROSIUS were passed, each day adding to his intellectual acquisition, intensifying his moral convictions, and developing his physical nature, thus laying the foundation for the superstructure which in later years expanded into a fame for statesmanship which was only bounded by the confines of our nation. From his infancy to manhood he was surrounded by those conditions that tend to make men good and great. During these years he acquired the habit of industry, and developed a love for knowledge which continued with him during his entire life, often burning the midnight oil when preparing for some great effort.

Mr. BROSIUS's great-grandfather, Henry Brosius, came from England and settled near Philadelphia in 1780. He was a member of the Society of Friends. His son Mahlon, the paternal grandfather of Mr. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, was an upright, consciencious gentleman, and exemplified the teachings of George Fox in his daily walk and life. Clarkson Brosius, father of our Congressman, was a leader in his community, and although an invalid for years, yet he was foremost in every good work for the elevation of his fellow-beings. He was a thorough gentleman, and devoted to his calling, that of farming. He was methodical, scientific, and enterprising, and ranked high as a model farmer. He was largely instrumental in organizing the Octorara Farmers' Club in 1856, which gave an impetus to higher farming in southern Lancaster and Chester counties. Clarkson Brosius died October 8, 1863, his last thoughts expressed to me were of his boy, far away on the Union firing line. The entire community was grief stricken at his untimely death.

On the maternal side our Congressman's great-grandfather was Samuel Hambleton, a consistent reformatory Friend. His sons were Samuel, Charles, Eli, and Thomas. Samuel was the father of Rachel, the mother of Mr. BROSIUS. Each of the other sons of Samuel, sr., offered their only sons to their country's cause. Gerrit Smith, son of Thomas, died in the service, C. Burleigh, son of Charles, being seriously wounded; he now resides in Atglen, Chester County.

Benjamin Kent, uncle of Mr. BROSIUS, tendered three sons that our nation might live. Mr. Mahlon G. Brosius, younger brother of Clarkson Brosius, was also in the service. He is now one of the most enterprising citizens of Chester County. From the above you may see that Mr. BROSIUS's patriotism was not only cultivated, but was also hereditary. His mother died when he was 7 years old, and two years after her death Mary Ann Brinton became his stepmother, and how well she performed a mother's part is attested on every side.

Although quite feeble, she, along with the other relatives, followed his body to the grave, that she might see the resting place, impelled by a mother's love. Her testimony is that MARRIOTT was ever dutiful, obedient, and self-denying for the happiness of the other members of the family.

Surrounded as he was by those influences which taught him the nobility of labor, the value of education, the rewards of industry, the dominion of integrity, and, in character forming, the power of the Christian religion, together with the refining graces of a well-ordered and Christian home—these could not fail to make of him a model of true manhood, free from all the vices which afflict mankind. Tobacco never polluted his mouth; alcohol never tainted his breath; profanity never desecrated his lips; veracity characterized his noble nature, ever and always.

His early school days were passed in Octorara and Chestnut Hill academies under the tutorage of that veteran teacher, Mr. Thomas Baker, who even at that early day predicted for his pupil a glorious future. His summers were spent upon the farm, engaged in manual labor himself, and in superintending, under his father's direction, the farm hands. But even when following the plow his studies were not neglected. With a dictionary in his pocket and some favorite classic author in his hand, his time for rest and recreation was spent in study. He had no time to spend in frivolous pleasures. Thus his days went gliding by, all too short to gratify his desire for the acquisition of useful knowledge.

The study of political economy had a decided fascination for his expanding genius. The contents of the New York Tribune were daily scanned, and he was authority on all national issues. When the war of the rebellion was inaugurated, then our young student-farmer became restless—a conflict was waged within his bosom between his duty to his parents and his duty to his country. The struggle for supremacy was won by his unqualified patriotism, and he obtained his parents' permission to enlist, though at a heart-breaking cost, as was often the case with other families where parents gave up their boys—alas, too often—to see them no more on earth. But these instances only illustrate the devotion of the American people to their flag and country.

Mr. BROSIUS was enrolled as a member of the Wayne Grays, a company of home guards I had been instrumental in organizing, for the purpose of drilling and becoming conversant with the manual of arms and field movements. My boys, as they became proficient in military drill, were daily deserting, with my permission and blessing, to join some regiment whose prospect for active service were brighter than ours. After Mr. BROSIUS had decided to enlist in some regiment ready for the field, he informed me of his intention. I remonstrated in vain. I told him of his usefulness at home, being then manager of two farms, a position no other person could fill so well; of the necessity of providing sustenance for the soldiers in the field; that he could serve his country best at home. He turned the argument against me by saying, "You are going into the service, leaving a wife and family; you are making greater sacrifices than I am. You tell me where to go to enlist." I gave him a note to my friend, Captain Wayne, Company K, Ninety-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. Two days after, in November, 1861, he and his uncle, Channing Brinton, presented themselves in my office, wearing United States uniforms, Mr. BROSIUS having first corporal chevron on his sleeves.

His history in service is summed up in a few lines by his colonel, Henry R. Guss, afterwards General Guss, and Colonel Price, who, with other members of the regiment, attended his funeral obsequies. Years after the war these officers paid him the following tribute:

"Mr. BROSIUS's record is linked and written with the Ninety-seventh Regiment, in whose rolls his name was subscribed in 1861; its history is his history, and its fame is his fame, and its glorious deeds are the sum of the faithful brave deeds of the men who, with him, went forth at the call of this country to do battle for the preservation of the life of the nation.

"Among the most earnest, yet quiet and unobtrusive, in all his actions, was MARRIOTT BROSIUS. From the day of his enlistment in the service until stricken down by the bullet of the enemy he was ever at his post of duty, active and vigilant as a sentinel, brave and courageous in the line of battle. He was regarded as a model soldier, as well from the force of culture that indicated the perfect gentleman, as from the exact fulfillment of duty that indicated the trained veteran soldier."

In the above few lines his war record is summed up. Aside from special acts, it is complete. In attempting to carry a disabled comrade from the field who had been mortally wounded, Mr. BROSIUS himself received the bullet from a rebel sharpshooter's rifle which nearly ended his life. This was the last charge which he was engaged in, the charge at Bermuda Hundred, which rivaled Picket's famous charge at Gettysburg. Here, as there, some one had blundered.

The wound he received necessitated the excision of the right shoulder joint and the removal of a portion of the arm bone, rendering the arm ever after useless. For eight months he was confined to the hospital, three months of which time he could not be turned in bed; but he bore his suffering with Christian fortitude. No murmuring, no repining escaped his lips. He was ever cheerful and resigned. In February, 1865, he was promoted to a lieutenantcy, although he had been mustered out of service, in consequence of disability, the previous December.

After returning to his home he spent some time in recuperating, and managing his great uncle, Thomas Hambleton's, farm, his leisure time being still devoted to study, as was such time when in the service. Being incapacitated for any kind of manual labor, he turned his attention to the study of medicine, and consulted me with a view of entering my office. I strongly remonstrated against any such procedure, and pointed out to him that there was no promotion for a physician, although, as an instrument in God's hands, he may perform miracles every day, yet they are soon forgotten; and he is often made the scapegoat for the sins of others. That, with few exceptions, the physician never rises above the dignity of a country crossroads doctor or an uptown city practitioner.

I pointed out to him that he was by nature an orator, and that the practice of law was the profession for which he was admirably suited, and therein he could hope for promotion. I advised him to take a course in my alma mater, Millersville Normal School, which he did. While attending this institution he became acquainted with Miss Elizabeth Jackson Coates, daughter of Mr. Simmons Coates, of West Grove, Chester County. Mr. Coates was a prominent and influential citizen of Chester County; also a member of the Society of Friends.

The acquaintance of Mr. BROSIUS and Miss Coates soon ripened into the strongest mutual attachment, with the usual result; and shortly after he was admitted to the Lancaster bar she became his wife, and no more congenial union was ever formed. Miss Coates had also opposed his studying medicine, and I think that her influence was more potent than mine in determining his decision to study law. Four daughters blessed their marriage, two of whom are living—Gertrude, wife of Mr. Herbert B. Coho, of New York, and Grace, wife of Mr. Clement Biddle, jr., of Pittsburg. Our Savior claimed Luretta R., aged 6 years, and Florence, aged 19 months, under the command, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." They are now in their father's arms, basking in the sunshine of the Heavenly Kingdom.

Mrs. Brosius contributed largely to her husband's successful career. His modest, unassuming nature required some one to lean upon in his many trials and tribulations, and at these times she cheered and comforted him and he learned to rely upon her wise counsel. She never doubted her husband's ability to distinguish himself, she knew his capabilities better than anyone else, and had fondly hoped for the realization of her waking dreams. Man proposes, but God disposes, and he was called home. God had some greater work for him to do.

Mrs. Brosius and family bear their sad bereavement with resignation, fortitude, and courage, knowing that the Father doeth all things well, and anticipate in heavenly mansions a happy and joyful reunion when the Father wills. Mr. BROSIUS's career at the bar and the high esteem in which he was held by his associates has been so beautifully portrayed in authoritative classic language that it is not my purpose to mar his lawyer history by my feeble efforts, which could only serve to cloud those bright pages of eulogies presented to his relatives and friends, in sorrow and in tears, by his associates, nor is it my purpose to speak of his Congressional life. That will be compiled by Dr. Sam. Houston, of Washington, than whom no one can speak from such intimate knowledge. He was one of his nearest friends.

However, I desire to say that it was no easy task to follow Stevens and Smith as the Representative of Lancaster County in the National Congress, the grandest district in our nation, and whose Representatives had always taken a leading part in shaping national legislation. Nevertheless, Mr. BROSIUS acquired the full confidence of his fellow-members in the House and rose to one of the highest and most important as also the most difficult position to fill in the gift of the popular branch of national lawmakers—that of chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

His work will live while our nation shall exist. He was an acknowledged authority on national financial legislation, and on this important subject he cut the Gordian knot and gave us the best system of currency in the world. At the last meeting of this committee resolutions strongly commending their chairman's impartial and uniformly courteous treatment were adopted, and the members of the committee individually, regardless of party affiliation, paid him high compliments for efficiency, not thinking they should meet him never again in their committee room.

After his appointment to this chairmanship he asked me if I was satisfied with the honor conferred. I answered, "No; I will never be satisfied until you represent Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States." He termed me an insatiate monster, exclaiming, "Can your friends never satisfy your ambition for their promotion?"

Mr. BROSIUS, in consequence of his ability, integrity, honesty, and geniality, was a general favorite with all the governmental officers, from the Chief Magistrate down to the porters and scrub women of the various buildings. When his death was announced in Washington, tears of true sorrow streamed down the sunburned faces of those in lowly positions in the departments, as well as over the cheeks of his associates and personal friends. He was one of the most popular Congressmen in Washington, and could and did accomplish more for his constituents than other less favored fellow-members.

He was indefatigable in his endeavors to serve his friends, regardless of the labor required. His old-soldier constituents had his entire sympathy, and no task was too great, no self-imposed duty too onerous, to deter him from the effort in their behalf. He knew, by sad experience, the sacrifices they had made, the privations they had endured, that rebellion in the interest of human slavery might be crushed out and our Union continue one and indissoluble forever. He was the soldiers' tried and true friend. No breath of calumny, suspicion, or doubting ever tainted the atmosphere in which he moved, and no one, not even his most intimate friends, dared approach him with compromising proposals. An unsullied conscience was his guide.

As an orator Mr. BROSIUS combined the cold, nervous logic and bitter sarcasm of Stevens, the scholarly grandeur of Smith, and the brilliant rhetorical fluency of Hensel.

He was regarded as the commanding orator of the United StatesCongress, and was often selected by his party members to lead the discussion in the House of Representatives in consequence of his clear conception, persuasive rhetoric, and faultless diction in presenting the subject under consideration. His fame as an orator was not confined to Congressional Halls; it was only bounded by our national lines. In consequence of his reputation he was eagerly sought to deliver memorial addresses in our larger cities and national cemeteries, the honor of being twice called to address the assembled multitudes in Arlington National Cemetery never having been extended to any other person.

As a political speaker he was sent by the national Republican committee, at the solicitation of the candidates, into closely contested districts. The inspiration of his presence, his fluent, convincing reasoning winning many to his party standard. But his great ability to sway congregations of people consisted not alone in his eloquence. His sterling integrity, unimpeachable honesty, and unqualified veracity were important factors in directing the general consensus of public opinion. His patriotism, intellectual powers, and immaculate life caused the people to trust him with that implicit confidence which knows no equivocation. No man, clique, nor junta dictated his course. While always granting to his constituents a respectful hearing, the decision rested with his own approving conscience.

In consequence of his diversified and liberal learning, Ursinus College conferred the degree of doctor of law upon him. Mr. BROSIUS was a member of the Society of Friends, of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Grand Army of the Republic, trustee of General Hospital, and of this society, with other honorable positions. The Brosius home life at No. 419 West Orange street, Lancaster, Pa., was happiness personified, each member of the household endeavoring to contribute to the pleasure and comfort of the others; gentleness and love permeated the entire atmosphere. The love for the good and beautiful was promoted by the æsthetic surroundings. Cheerfulness was the predominant characteristic. It could not be otherwise, for the mother is of angelic nature. To illustrate the conditions governing the family, permit me to say that shortly before Mr. BROSIUS stepped from the topmost round of the ladder of fame into the Celestial City whose streets are paved with gold, at a time when statesmen, editors, poets, and historians were vying with each other to do him honor, he said to a friend of his boyhood that of all the encomiums ever paid to him, the highest tribute was by his daughter, who said: "Papa, we never saw you angry." No one could enter that home circle without feeling it was good to be there; and while we all sorrow and regard his death as a personal and national calamity, it was here within this magnetic home that the arrow of the insatiate archer sank the deepest.

Oh, Death, why did you claim this husband, father, and kind friend? To us this is incomprehensible. Why he should be stricken down in the prime of mature manhood, ere the shades of evening began to fall, in the midst of gratifying achievements, at a time when his vision only revealed the roseate hues of the earth, when the earnest of the past gave brighter hopes and aspirations for some future usefulness. These are a few of the many questions which agitated the minds of those who ministered unto him during the setting of his sun. We can not answer; only the Father knows, and not until the flood of heavenly light bursts upon us in the New Jerusalem can we know. Three hours before the delivery unto him of the message of death I had spent an hour with him in social conversation. He was cheerful and happy. For the time had laid aside his innate dignity and used me as a target for his witty sallies. That evening, Friday, March 16, 1901, a hasty summons brought me quickly to his bedside.

No pen can describe the consternation and perturbation which seized me when I beheld my friend clasped in the embrace of death. Quickly summoning our mutual friend, Dr. S. L. Davis, we engaged in unequal combat with the grim monster. We had often successfully engaged in battle with the same enemy before. We had also met him when he appeared as an angel of mercy, but here he presented himself to us in the rôle of the wicked assassin. Our combined medical knowledge, experience, and skill was evoked, but our efforts were futile. Until the midnight meridian was far past we continued the now almost hopeless struggle, although it was apparent that we, with all our efforts, were being vanquished.

Love and hope but ill supplied
The power to stem the ebbing tide.

When fully convinced that his translation from earth to heaven was only a question of a few minutes of time, we turned our efforts to smoothing his heavenward pathway, and quietly, gently, as though in sweet slumber, his spirit parted from the tenement in which for years it had dominated his actions in life and was guided hence by angel spirits. Nothing remained with us but his loved and cherished body. The soul had gone to God who gave it. But "his works and worth and fatal zeal now claim our gratitude and grief and will embalm his memory in the human heart forever."

Nor wreck nor change nor winter's blight,
Nor death's remorseless doom,
Shall dim one ray of holy light
That gilds his glorious tomb.

The arrangements for Mr. BROSIUS's interment were made by Col. E. F. Pierce, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, and Mr. Fishback, Mr. BROSIUS's private secretary, the time appointed being 2 o'clock p. m., March 20.

Mr. BROSIUS's body lay in state at his home on above date, and for hours a constant procession passed the casket, all anxious through their tear-dimmed eyes to have a last fond look at their beloved friend. The Congressional committee, composed of Senators and Members of House of Representatives, arrived in Lancaster the morning of the funeral to take part in the obsequies. Rev. Dr. Alleman feelingly delivered an impressive and eloquent sermon, after which the body was borne to the grave in Greenwood Cemetery, the pavements on both sides of the streets the entire distance—ten squares—being thronged with loving friends, who, with weeping eyes, were braving the rainfall to have a look at the casket which contained the body of him whom they loved in life and whose memory they will ever cherish.

Go to the grave, for there thy Saviour lay
In death's embrace ere He rose on high,
And all the ransomed by that narrow way
Pass to eternal life beyond the sky.

There is no such state as death,
The change is a translation
From fields and scenes of labor here,
Which is only our probation.

In conclusion, I desire to say that could you, upon the morning his spirit winged its flight from earth, have withdrawn the veil which shields the portals of heaven from mortal gaze, and for one moment viewed the blood-washed throng on high, you would there have seen Lincoln and Grant and Garfield and Stevens and Smith and Harrison, with many others whose memories we delight to honor, all greeting our own MARRIOTT BROSIUS, while a gentle voice from out the blue vault of heaven could have been heard saying, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will set thee over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' Then—

Bring hither springtime flowers,
And strew our comrade's grave,
Though faded be the offering,
It speaks the love we gave
To him, our gifted brother,
Hero of forensic war;
In Congress halls, and forum,
A bright and shining star;
The soldier and the statesman,
The orator and bard,
A chieftain of the many Famed sons of the Old Guard.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RHEA of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in offering my tribute to the memory of the late Representative from Pennsylvania I shall not employ the language of mere laudation, but will only seek to give expression to the admiration I had for the man and the sincere respect I felt for his character. It was my privilege to serve on the committee of which he was chairman, that of Banking and Currency, and knew him fairly well. He was a kindly, courteous gentlemen. Intensely in earnest, life to him meant something. It was duty, and he seemed to project his own upon the idea that we are "only remembered by what we have done." A man of real convictions himself, he was tolerant of the opinions and beliefs of others.

He was painstaking and methodical. With an intelligent mind, disciplined by studious thought, he was at all times prepared to reason out his own conclusions with clearness and force. Of his private and domestic life I can not speak. It was not my pleasure to know him around the hearthstone, and must therefore leave to those who enjoyed that pleasure to speak concerning his home life. Though holding convictions exactly the opposite to his own touching almost every important question that has divided this great country into two political parties, I am not blinded to the real merit of MARRIOTT BROSIUS, and only tell you what I believe to be true when I say that in his death a patriotic, genial, kindly citizen passed away, and that this House, the the country, and his own great Commonwealth lost a faithful, thoughtful, conscientious, and able public servant.

The death of such a man, Mr. Speaker, always brings sorrow to those who knew and loved him. His family, his wife and children, mourn, and no word that any member of this body could say can still the pain their hearts must feel; but they may find consolation in the fact that he was pure in heart and eloquent of tongue, courageous in action and wise in council and as a public servant, and that the name and character he has builded up will outlive even the records of this House. They may find comfort in that knowledge.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, in March last, shortly after the expiration of the last Congress, the subject of this memorial occasion made sudden response to the death summons. Although he had displayed much courage and had met on various fields the antagonism of moral and civil combat, yet in this arena he was unable to overcome the enemy, and his mortal remains are now in earth's prison house, captive of this merciless foe. Here is another forceful reminder of the certainty of death. In the morning of that early spring day Mr. BROSIUS was on the streets of his home; in the evening he was stricken down and passed away. Those of this House who knew him were aware of his strong physique, his healthful prospect, and hopeful promise of many years of life and usefulness; but alas, human vision can not behold the future, nor human intellect divine it.

Mr. BROSIUS died at his home in Lancaster, Pa., a beautiful city of 30,000 inhabitants. This historic town was for a time the seat of the Continental Congress and for several years was the capital of Pennsylvania.

This city was the home and burial place of James Buchanan, fifteenth President of the United States, who died there in June, 1868.

As one of the Congressional escort, I had the opportunity to see the evidence of affection which the people of Lancaster manifested toward their departed friend and neighbor. He was universally spoken of as a good man, a true citizen, a faithful friend, and an exemplary Christian character. He erected his own monument of good deeds. He laid well the foundation of life and constructed thereon the solid abiding structure which shall endure, when time's changes shall cease, and the Eternal shall preserve the record of that which shall live forever. His epitaph is written in the hearts of those who knew him and will be read in tradition by those who may follow. He was an exponent of the doctrine of purity in life and an example of manhood in politics. It is said that he never resorted to questionable methods to secure his own preferment; that in private life or public station he was the same honest, conscientious, Christian gentleman. If I mistake not, his life, like the lamented McKinley's, was preeminent for his goodness, and however much of ability and statesmanship he exhibited, his crowning grace consisted in his integrity and uprightness.

No mystery is more complete than death; no subject is fraught with more significance than its consideration. The spirit departs; the body disintegrates. How cheerless the thought that this dissolution can not be avoided! What is its philosophy? The wisest sages have sought to explain its phenomena, but to no avail. The fountain of perpetual youth has never been discovered, yet men have made every possible exploration that it might be found. There is one hope in the midst of this research, one bright oasis in the desert of man's failure; that is the promise of the Christian's faith that beyond death is a glorious life. There is one revelation that illumines the path, that clears the sky, that cheers the faint, that gives solace to the sorrowing. It is the Book that tells of man, his duty and destiny, and points out the elysian fields that lie beyond, where separations are not, where mourning is never known, and the memorials are the glad songs of the redeemed.

Mr. BROSIUS believed in the Christian's God, accepted the truth as the Book revealed it, and, we may justly trust, is now in the enjoyment of that which he accepted through faith, while duty impelled him to action and strength, gave promise of earthly existence.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, MARRIOTT BROSIUS was a man, the very best type of a man, because he endeavored to actually be what he desired to seem to be. He could not think dishonestly, much less act dishonestly. His was a true and transparent nature. His ideals were high, and he never lost sight of them, pursuing them constantly in his all-absorbing companionship with books, the stepping-stones to his uplifting aspirations.

When one recalls the sweetness of his soul and the purity of his character, one is impelled to imagine that somewhere in the halls of his memory were written, in shining letters, these words:

Man is his own star, and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man.
Command all light, all influence, all fate,
Nothing to him falls too early or too late.
Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.

His presence brought sunshine, mellowing the relations of life into friendships. It left every man a little better because he had known MARRIOTT BROSIUS; it left the world a little better because his spirit had passed through it. How true this is, the old members of the Banking and Currency Committee, after years of association, can testify; but words spoken on this occasion can not be half so eloquent as incidents of unquestioned proof. His parting with the committee just prior to the adjournment of the Fifty-sixth Congress was so characteristic of the man, and its spirit so aptly reflected his influence, that I shall add the minutes of that last meeting to these few words, in order that they may be preserved for the pleasure and profit of all who in after years recall his long, faithful, and patriotic public service.

It were well, indeed, if the world could count among the living more characters like that of MARRIOTT BROSIUS.

At the conclusion of business at the last meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, Wednesday, February 27, 1901, the following remarks were made by the chairman, Mr. BROSIUS, and other members of the committee:

Mr. BROSIUS. The Chair feels like asking the indulgence of the committee for a moment. In justice to my own feelings I can not allow the final separation of this committee for the term without expressing to my associates about this table the satisfaction I have enjoyed in their companionship in the work which is about to end. This has been an harmonious body. No circumstances has impeded our work or marred the perfect cordiality of our relations. We have also been a business committee. We have considered and disposed of about 30 bills, placed 6 upon the Calendar, and passed 1, and may yet pass more. I hazard nothing in saying that the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives in recent years has not made a better record.

During the two sessions we have been together we have dwelt not in love and mutiny, but in a high degree of love and unity. When we could not agree we disagreed decently. There has been uniform cordiality and good fellowship in our intercourse. Time and time again the Chair has felicitated himself upon his good fortune in having upon this committee men so capable and at the same time so agreeable on both sides of the table. They have all been helpful in the prosecution of the work of the committee. The Chair desires to express how highly he has appreciated the uniform courtesy and kindness and helpfulness of the members of this committee without distinction of party, and now that we are about to separate and go to our homes at the end of this term, you, my brethren, will carry with you not only my very best wishes, my thanks and gratitude, but my prayer, that time will deal gently with all of you and that you will enjoy a season of unalloyed happiness and rest, and return to our associations here at the next term with the same cordiality and good fellowship which have characterized our relations during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. TALBERT. It is a true saying of the Scripture, "How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." We have dwelt together in unity, socially if not politically, since I have been a member of this committee; that is, we have agreed to disagree whenever we could not agree. I for one want to say that I have formed an attachment for the chairman and each and every one of the members of this committee, regardless of party. I feel glad to say that, and when I say it, it is not merely from my lips, but it comes from the bottom of my heart; and I intended to rise before the chairman did to move that the thanks of this committee are due and are hereby tendered to the chairman, Brother BROSIUS, for the extreme good will, courtesy, and impartiality and general kindness which he has extended during this Congress as chairman of this committee to each and every one of us. I want now to offer a resolution of thanks on behalf of this committee to the chairman and ask that a standing vote be had upon that resolution.

Mr. STALLINGS. Before a vote is taken upon Mr. TALBERTS's resolution I want to say a word. I believe I am, after Mr. COX, who is not present, the ranking member of the minority of this committee. I have served on it for six years. I desire to thank the chairman for his uniform courtesy and kindness to the minority. I desire further to thank him on behalf of the minority of this committee not only for the kindly way we have been treated in this committee, but for courtesies on the floor of the House. With this Congress, Mr. Chairman, my relations with this committee and Congress will be severed. I am possibly—quite likely—meeting for the last time with this committee, composed of men whom I have served with for years and whom I have learned to esteem highly as gentlemen and appreciate as friends. When I return to my home in the South to take up again the thread of life where it was left off years ago, to commence again the practice of my profession, I shall go with a feeling of love and kindness not only for you gentlemen on my own side of the committee, but for every member of this committee for the courteous treatment and kindly consideration I have received at the hands of the chairman and each member of the committee. It is my hope and prayer that time may deal gently with each of you and that God's choicest blessings may be your future reward.

Mr. HILL. I have served on this committee six years with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Stallings]. There have been some scenes of storm and contest in our days of service, but I believe I voice the sentiment of the members of this committee who have served during that time that never has there been anything but kindness and good feeling on the part of every member for the good, honest sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Alabama. The majority of this committee have recognized the differences that have existed, and acute they were on many questions, but they have always felt that the good, sterling judgment of the gentleman from Alabama dictated every action he ever took in this committee and every expression that he ever made, and I am sure that I voice the sentiment of the majority when I say that there has never been a member whose aid and judgment were more gladly received than those of the gentleman from Alabama. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that if he ever comes into the cold North and to the town of Norwalk, Conn., and does not find the home of E. J. HILL, I shall feel that I have a personal grievance against him.

I appreciate thoroughly the assistance we have had from the Chair, and in the absence of the ranking Republican member of the committee [Mr. FOWLER] I want to reciprocate every kind wish which he has expressed for us and our hopes for his future prosperity and advancement.

Mr. BROSIUS. The cordiality of expression which has been evinced is exceedingly gratifying to the Chair, and it suggests what must be a solace and satisfaction to every member of the committee, the reflection that there has not been an unkind word uttered around this table for the two years the committee has occupied this room. Each one has done his own part with a perfect recognition of the right of every other one to do his duty as he saw it.

Mr. CAPRON. It is suggested by my colleague on the left [Mr. LOVERING] that as we are now to part as members of this committee, misfortunes which come to mortals face us, and that there are other breaks to occur in our ranks, that it would be well at this time to occupy a moment in referring to other gentlemen besides Brother Stallings who are to leave us, and I wish to say to Mr. Driggs, who also leaves Congress and us, not to return, and also in the absence of our genial and long-time member, Mr. Cox, who has been a working member of this committee, of such value to the committee with his broad views—not sectional—broad enough to take in the whole country from the standpoint of his great mind upon these questions, and also of the intelligence and interest which Brother Driggs has brought to it his in connection with the committee, and that the committee can not part with these gentlemen, knowing that they are not to return to us again, without an expression of our profound regard, which is intensified and crystallized into love, and I hope in going from us and from Congress that they will retain a tender place in the hearts of their colleagues on the Banking and Currency Committee, which I know would be voiced by every member of the Fifty-sixth Congress if they had the opportunity.

Mr. DRIGGS. It is not very often that a man who represents a part of the great Tammany organization is overcome with embarrassment, but upon this occasion in replying to Mr. CAPRON I am overcome. I desire to thank the chairman of this committee and the members of the majority of this committee for their uniform courtesy and kindliness to me since I have been a member of this committee. I desire to thank them for the opportunities they have given me here and on the floor of the House, and I desire also especially to thank my Democratic colleagues. When I came here in the Fifty-fifth Congress my views on the money question were in direct contradistinction to their views.

I believe there was only one other Democrat in the House at that time who held the views I did on the money question; and, notwithstanding that, the gentlemen from the South and West, whether members of this committee or other members of the House, did not insult me, notwithstanding the animus there might have been against Gold Democrats generally, but they conceded that I was honest in my opinion, and they respected me the more because I stood up for what I believed to be right. I will simply add in conclusion that when the Speaker told me I was to be appointed a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I told him I had not the banking knowledge, experience, or ability to serve on this committee; but you gentlemen have made the service on this committee an easy possibility—you have made it an educational possibility. I thank the chairman and all of you for the courtesy and kindness which you have shown to me, Driggs, the Gold Democrat.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask a rising vote upon my resolution.

Mr. HILL (after the vote). The resolution is carried unanimously.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the last time I saw him whose death we mourn he was full of robust life and high ambition. His speech pictured with a master's skill the growth and grandeur of the Republic and the glory that is in store for it in the years that are to come. He had no thought of death, but was looking forward, planning for future years of work and usefulness.

Oh, what had he to do with cruel death who was so full of life, or death with him,
That he shouldst die before he had grown old!

To solve the question why the good are cut off in the midst of their years and honors and others who could well be spared are left is a hopeless task. In no case more so than in that of MARRIOTT BROSIUS. He was in the prime of his strength and manhood, respected and beloved by his people whom he had served long and well, honored throughout his State as a conscientious toiler in the interests of pure politics, public morality, and good government.

To him the performance of duty was the highest consideration; where its path led, there he walked. No belted knight ever held a higher sense of chivalric devotion to duty. He was a man of ideals, conscience, and convictions. His ideals were high and noble, his conscience active in shaping his daily life, and his convictions were always on the side of truth, justice, and liberty. He never stopped to count the cost to himself when the question was one between human rights and human wrongs. His voice was always for freedom and equality. For the laboring poor his sympathy was broad and his help never failing. To lift up the weak in their battle with the strong was for him religious duty; in its performance he never faltered. No poor man who applied to him ever lacked for an advocate because he could bring no fee. His profession was an instrumentality for righting wrongs, not for the accumulation of wealth. He never "crooked the pregnant hinges of the knee, that thrift might follow fawning."

He loved his God, his country, and his fellow-men, and did of his endeavor to serve them all. It is not wonderful that through all the fertile valleys and smiling plains of Lancaster, which are as fair as any that lie under the shining sun, his death struck terror and dismay, or that the people whom he had known, high and low, felt a sense of personal loss. Their brave leader lay dead, stricken in the fullness of his strength, in the prime of his life, in the height of his mental power. Who could take his place? The brilliant advocate, the experienced statesman, the brave soldier, the true patriot, was slain before his time. It was terrible. There are deaths which admit of alleviating suggestions. In this case there are none. Only in sublime faith that can say, "Even though He slay me, yet will I trust Him," can those who mourn find relief.

Death smote him with relentless hand; he has gone out of sight forever. His cheery presence will gladden his dear ones no more. His voice, eloquent on the side of justice and right, is still. MARRIOTT BROSIUS is dead:

He gave his honors to the world again,
His blessed part to Heaven, and sleeps in peace.

Joining all who knew and loved him, we mourn his loss and turn aside for a moment from the rush and roar of life to pay to his memory a last tribute of respect and to crown him with the honor that is his due.

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Speaker, MARRIOTT BROSIUS was my friend. I remember well the kindly greeting he gave me when I first entered the Fifty-fifth Congress. I had known him for years as one of Pennsylvania's gifted sons, but had never met him. I shall never forget our first meeting. Congress was in extraordinary session in the spring of 1897. I had just been sworn in. Mr. BROSIUS was the first to greet and welcome me. From that day a warm friendship sprung up between us—a friendship that was never chilled. He was my friend. I loved him for his genial nature, his broad intellect, his wonderful endowments, his exalted patriotism, and his dauntless manhood. MARRIOTT BROSIUS was as brave as a lion, and as gentle as a child; he was courageous and gentle; he knew no fear.

He was generous, kind, loving, and true. The great heart that beat for other's woes, that cherished no resentments, that held only affection, lies still in death. The gentle hand that so often ministered to alleviate suffering lies pulseless and cold. He is dead, but his memory and his achievements will never die; they are imperishable and will endure till time shall be no more. The record of his noble life is full of devotion to duty. He was among the first of Pennsylvania's 350,000 loyal sons who responded to their country's call in the dark days of the sixties, when the war cloud hovered o'er our land, when our misguided brethren of the South land sought to establish another republic upon our soil.

His career as a soldier of the Union was characterized by deeds of valor on many fields of battle, for which his country rewarded him by several promotions. As a statesman he had few peers and no superiors. He was universally beloved by the people of his State and district. Let us emulate his example. Let us practice his virtues.

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up,
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a citizen of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania I have been touched by the eloquent and heartfelt tributes that have been paid by members on both sides of this Chamber to the memory of one of her most distinguished sons. I had not anticipated making any remarks upon this occasion, but can not refrain from joining in those tributes indicative of respect, esteem, and affection which his life and character inspired in the bosom of all who knew him. It was my pleasure to know him for nearly twenty years, and though striking, as he did, most sturdy blows in behalf of any cause which appealed to his reason and his conscience, I recall no instance where even in the heat and acrimony of partisan contests he ever struck an unfair blow, stooped beneath the dignity of the Christian statesman, or led any man to question the sincerity of the motives which animated him.

He has left a life history every page of which, recording strenuous action, is nevertheless unstained and unsullied. View him as warrior, civilian, or statesman, the bold, high-minded, generous, charitable, Christian graces shine with equal luster in all the varied settings. He was one who loved his fellow-men, his country, and his Creator, and that love was never hid under the bushel, but shone out in the common acts of his daily life and illumined his face with that cheery smile which we shall ever remember. Mr. Speaker, as a citizen of Pennsylvania I am proud that it was ours to give him to his country to brighten the pages which abound with history of sons of Pennsylvania who have in their lives and deaths made her name famous in national annals.

Lancaster, one of our fairest counties, honored him by repeated selection for membership in this body, but MARRIOTT BROSIUS honored Lancaster county still more. No fairer commentary, no juster measure of the moral worth of any community, can be afforded than in the choice of such a high-minded Christian statesman as their Representative at the national capital. His labors are ended and he has passed on to his rewards. The memory of his kindly impulse, his generous deeds, his eloquent words, and patriotic service remains as a rich legacy, to be treasured not alone by the citizens of our Commonwealth, but by those of our common country as well.

We have pronounced him dead, and what, after all, is death but the entrance to the broader life? His work was done and well done. Why, then, should he not rest from his labors?

Death is not the curse, but the coronation; not the defeat, but the victory; not a serpent, but an angel.

There is no death. What seems so is transition.
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call death.

Such a life as his is too large, too far-reaching, too boundless, for the narrow confines of the tomb. Generous words and kindly action are immortal. They are the good seed in the good soil which fructify and multiply through the long swing and sweep of coming æons. He has fought the good fight, he has kept the faith, and wears the conqueror's crown.

No stream from its source flows seaward, however lonely its course,
But what some land is gladdened. No star ever rose
And set without influence somewhere. Who knows
What earth needs of earth's lowest creatures. No life
Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife
And all life not be purer and stronger thereby.
The spirits of just men made perfect on high.
The army of martyrs who stand by the throne
And gaze into the face that makes glorious their own
Know this surely at last, honest love, honest sorrow,
Honest work for the day, honest hope for the morrow,
Are these worth nothing more than the hand they make weary,
The heart they have saddened, the life they leave dreary?
Hush! the sevenfold heavens to the voice of the spirit
Echo—He that o'ercometh shall all things inherit.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, again this body is called upon to give official expression to its grief in the loss of one of its most beloved and respected members, the Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, who departed this life on the 16th of March, 1901, at his home in Lancaster, Pa. As one who had the honor of his acquaintance, I approach this sad duty with feelings of misgivings and hesitation, as my brief remarks must necessarily fail in doing full justice to my subject. After all has been said of our departed friend, we must confess that human speech is utterly inadequate to give expression to the emotions which stir the heart upon the death of a great and good man. We are at once overwhelmed at the thought that we have been forever bereft of his genial presence, the warm grasp of his hand, the familiar sound of his voice, and, above all, the bright and kind luster of his eyes; all, all are gone forever!

Much as we may philosophize, and great as is the comfort and consolation we find in faith in immortality, we nevertheless stand appalled at the transition from life to death. Time, the great healer of all ills, at last dries up our tears and helps us over the gulf of sorrow; it is indeed God's healing art, the balm which He employs to slowly heal the wounds which grief has inflicted and by which He again fills the heart with new hope and fresh joy.

Well do I remember my last meeting with our distinguished friend. It was during one of those precious moments when members, regardless of party affiliations, gather in small groups and engage in social converse and friendly greetings in the Hall of Representatives; the time for the adjournment of the last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress was drawing near and members were bidding each other adieu. In the course of conversation Mr. BROSIUS remarked that he felt better than he had felt for a long time; that he looked forward with bright anticipation to the recreation the vacation would afford him and the renewed zest with which he expected to return to his labors in the Fifty-seventh Congress; that he was at peace with the world and bore no ill will to anyone.

Little, indeed, did I think that I was bidding him a final farewell, and that within a few short weeks I should be called upon to assist in laying his earthly remains to rest. But our friend was unexpectedly and suddenly stricken down by the fell reaper who is no respecter of persons or of time or place, and who comes like the thief in the night, without warning. Yet death did not find him unprepared, and had no terrors for him, as he had lived an incorruptible life, crowned with honor, usefulness, and the affections of his fellow-men. He died in his own happy home that he had founded, surrounded by kindred and friends, in the unfaltering devotion to his people and faith in his God. He had served his country on the battlefield and in the forum; he had borne the brunt wherever duty, civic and military, had called him; he had trod the lofty planes of statesmanship and charmed and electrified listening senates and assemblies of men with his eloquence, and had bared his breast to the missiles of war; he had burned the midnight oil of the student, and walked the perilous paths of the soldier; he had discharged the duties of the citizen and the loyal friend, and he had consecrated his life to family, home, and country. He had, in a word, lived the life of the just, a man without fear or reproach. Well could it be said of him:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up,
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

But our friend, while so well equipped for all the strenuous duties of life which were so admirably tempered by his strong social traits and his innate taste for the beautiful, yet realized and appreciated, with a deep religious conviction, the serious side of life. He was a philosopher as well as a soldier and statesman. Not only did he drink deep at the fountain of knowledge, but he was a student of nature, and with majestic sweep his mind was prone to explore the mysteries of life and its profound meaning from many sides. This side of his nature produced that nice balance of character which set him at peace with all the world and his fellow-men.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, MARRIOTT BROSIUS, whose life and services we commemorate to-day, was my friend.

We first met in the Fifty-first Congress, and from the beginning of our acquaintance our lines were closely drawn together.

To love the same things and to hate the same things constitute true friendship.

Measured by this standard, personal and political, we became closer in our relations in each successive Congress in which we have served together.

His record as a soldier, a citizen, and a statesman has been recited by his colleagues, and I can add nothing to the same. In thinking of what I might say upon this occasion it occurred to me that, as these exercises will be printed in a memorial volume, there was nothing that I could prepare which would so well give a correct view of our departed friend as to quote his own utterances upon like occasions.

I have listened to him upon the tariff, the currency, and other political questions. I have heard him at the banqueting board, but there was no place or theme where the beauty of his diction and the purity of his sentiments made a stronger impression than when, upon a memorial service, he gave utterance to the feelings of his generous heart.

I intend, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to pluck from the garden of his eloquence two flowers that I deem worthy to place with our own tributes to his memory, and I therefore submit, to be printed in his memorial volume, his own beautiful and impressive language in his addresses upon the lives and services of Vice-President Hobart and Congressman Hoffecker, of Delaware, the latter of which was his last address in this House.

Let me quote the last words of his last speech on this floor as he spoke of his departed colleague.

He said:

That while green grass will cover his grave, blue skies bend over it, sweet birds sing near it, and the place will be hallowed ground, yet greener than the grass, fairer than the skies, sweeter than the birds, more hallowed than the grave itself will be his fragrant memory, enshrined with supreme sacredness in their heart of hearts.

And as his voice, trembling with emotion, uttered these words he took his seat, and his eloquent voice was no more to be heard in this Hall forever.

MEMORIAL TO VICE-PRESIDENT GARRET A. HOBART.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker—

"Sir Launcelot, there thou lyest; thou were never matched by none earthly knight's hands; thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode a horse; thou were the kindest man that ever struck with a sword.—La Morte d'Arthur."

The Arabs had a saying that death is a camel that kneels at every man's door. This expresses how common an event it is in the providential order, as common and familiar as birth; yet of all natural events it produces the most profound and lasting impression upon the mind. This is true even when it comes to the humble and undistinguished; much more so when it overtakes those eminent persons who have achieved honor and distinction in the public service and occupy positions of great elevation in the public eye and in general esteem.

The death of the gifted and great has always been and will ever be a solemn, impressive, and imposing circumstance. Its value in the way of example, admonition, and instruction is in proportion to the elevation from which the subject falls to his natural end. It comes to the surviving like a faithful schoolmaster with the open book of a closed life, and assigns the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching. The fame of the great and noble dead is among the most enduring and valuable of our public possessions, and the contemplation of their example and their virtues exerts a salutary and ennobling influence upon the living.

It is one of the very best of men—and there is no higher praise—that we contemplate to-day. It is the universal estimation, the consensus of opinion among those who knew him, that the late Vice-President, in the essential elements of a well-organized being and the necessary excellencies of a character of the very first rank, had few, if any, superiors. The high success he achieved, the eminence he attained, the perfect character he formed, were not due to any adventitious aids. Neither birth nor rank nor fortune smoothed his upward way to the clear-aired heights he reached and kept. True, he had the good fortune to be born in a country one of whose glories is that its social formation is not in horizontal strata common in the Old World, through which few ever pass from below upward, but is mobile as the sea, where the lowest drop, winged with merit, may rise and glitter on the highest wave that rolls. All else was due to principles, qualities, and forces which summed up a strong, interesting, and attractive personality.

If the limits of the occasion permitted, we could easily name the traits which were chief agencies in the development of his splendid manhood. Honor, sympathy, courage, and duty were the precious and conspicuous jewels in the crown of his superb character, and we may set them apart to-day and lift them over his new-made grave as the golden texts in the lesson of his life.

Some one has said he had an unusual capacity for winning affection. This was due to his deep human sympathy. He was not deficient in imagination and could place himself in the position of others and realize their distresses and their needs. His kindness to every human creature was proverbial. He was happy in promoting the comfort of those who served him. In his business career, which was a conspicuous success, his example if followed would cure two maladies said to afflict our time—the envious hatred of him who suffers want and the selfish forgetfulness of him who lives in affluence. This problem can be solved by sympathy, love, and good will.

There is no sunshine like that of kindness to open those beautiful flowers, sympathy, love, hope, and trust, which ought to bloom over the garden walls which separate the rich and the poor. Mr. Hobart was thoroughly imbued with that beautiful sentiment which holds the human family in the bonds of unity and love, that we are children of the same Father, traveling toward the same home, and hoping to sit down at last at the same banquet, and therefore we should "love one another."

"So many gods, so many creeds,
So many ways so hard to find,
When all this wicked world needs
Is just the art of being kind."

Our distinguished friend has been twice ennobled. Death and duty ennoble all men. Devotion to duty was one of his characteristic traits. Her command to him a "Thus saith the Lord." He was unremitting in his attention to his public engagements. His entire life exemplified the truth that the path of duty is the upward way; that—

"Not once or twice in our fair land's story
The path of duty was the way to glory."

Our souls should bow before the temple that enshrines the divinity of duty. These superb characters are the rarest fruit of earth, and their surviving countrymen may well cherish the fine vintage of their example for their perpetual refreshment.

The Vice-President, whom we mourn, was stricken in the midst of his usefulness from the highest public place save one in the gift of the people, a position which, despite its elevation, he honored more than it could honor him. The character and relative eminence of the office of Vice-President has been the subject of diverse comment for a hundred years, many people regarding it as quite subordinate in consequence and rank. The original constitutional mode of selecting the President and Vice-President denoted the estimation in which the framers of the Constitution held the Vice-Presidential office, and yet some of them and their contemporaries spoke slightingly of that office. John Adams said:

"My country has in its wisdom contrived for us the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived or his imagination conceived."

Thomas Jefferson said:

"It is the only office in the world about which I am unable to decide whether I had rather have it or not have it."

Whatever rank may have been assigned to it at different periods of our history, it is the glory of its last incumbent that he restored the Vice-Presidency to its true rank, redeemed it from any obscurity into which it may have fallen, rescued it from the insignificance in which it came to be regarded by some, and established its title to the dignity and elevation appropriate to the second office in the gift of the American people.

It is thus seen what a beautiful and instructive career has closed on earth. He did not live man's appointed time. The mysterious clock to which Dr. Holmes so beautifully refers, which the angel of life wound up to run three score years and ten, ran down before the lapse of the allotted time. But the bounds which are fixed to the duration of life do not always measure its worth. His career, though cut off in the midst of its usefulness, has been a sweet and wholesome example in right living, high thinking, and unselfish service in private and public walks of life, and his fragrant memory will ever remain an inspiration to those who loved him living and mourn him dead.

There is a tradition that among the Seneca Indians a singularly beautiful belief prevailed that when a loved one died, if they caught a singing bird and, binding it with messages of love and affection, released it over the grave of the departed, it would not fold its wings nor close its eyes until it reached the spirit land and delivered the messages to the loved and lost. So may the friends who mourn to-day bind with messages of love the birds that are singing in their hearts songs of homage and affection, and, releasing them at the grave of the departed, may enjoy the solace of believing that they will not fold their wings until they reach the spirit land and deliver the messages to the loved and lost.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS TO JOHN H. HOFFECKER, OF DELAWARE.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, when Tell's arrow pierced the breast of the tyrant Gessler, and he lay bleeding and dying in the mountain pass, he was surrounded by a company of Friars of Mercy who happened to be passing, who sang these lines:

"With noiseless tread death comes on man;
No plea, no prayer delivers him;
From midst of busy life's unfinished plan,
With sudden hand it severs him.
And ready or not ready, no delay,
Forth to his Judge's bar he must away."

I crave a brief indulgence on this occasion to mingle my voice with the swelling anthem of affectionate eulogy because I respected and honored our departed friend while living, and I feel a sincere and reverential regard for his memory. The duration of his life, the usefulness of his labors, the benevolence of his feelings, the elevation of his sentiments, and the nobility of his character united to form an attractive and interesting personality and a career instructive and admirable in a high degree.

His brief service in this House afforded no opportunity for the exhibition of any marked aptitude for the higher ranges of statesmanship, but his attention to the wants of his constituents and his tireless devotion to duty accentuated that fidelity which marks the successful Representative on this floor and furnished an example quite worthy of imitation. His kindly and sympathetic nature, his graces of mind and heart, amiability of character, sweetness of disposition, gentleness of manner, and fine courtesy made conquest of universal esteem and placed him high in the hearts of those who had the good fortune to know him. His constituents appreciated and loved him. They knew his diligence in their service; they knew that the command of duty was to him a "thus saith the Lord;" that no draft made upon him in any matter whose claim he recognized would ever go to protest. So they trusted him and were never betrayed; confided in him and found him worthy.

The lesson such a career, brief as it was, teaches appeals to all of us, that the only way for a Representative to securely hold the confidence and affection of his constituents is in the demonstration of his worthiness by integrity, fidelity, industry, and efficiency in their service.

Mr. Hoffecker was a man of light and leading in his community. He was a gentleman of the old school, courtly and polished in manners, with an attractive personality that commanded universal respect. The variety and prominence of the positions he held of a business, social, and ecclesiastical character denoted the commanding influence he exerted in his community. When he was laid to rest the chief mourner was the town in which he had dwelt. In recognition of his private worth and public services all places of business were closed. "Grand, good Christian gentleman! No unkind word was ever spoken of him," said one who had known him for many years. "A noble Christian man, a counselor always safe, an honored and trusted citizen," said another. "One of God's noblemen, always engaged in love and good works," said another old acquaintance. His sterling manhood, exalted character, and broad Christian spirit gave him the deserved preeminence he enjoyed in the State he so faithfully represented for a brief period on this floor.

Our departed friend reached and passed the bounds of man's appointed years. The mysterious clock which the angel of life wound up to run three score years and ten and gave the key to the angel of the resurrection, as beautifully suggested by Dr. Holmes, ran a little beyond the appointed time.

Death came unheralded. We heard the rustle and saw the shadow of his wings, and it was over. "As the shadows steal at evening over the earth, softly closing the flowers and touching them to sleep, silently and lovingly in the promise of a bright waking," so he fell asleep. Nature, with a little rudeness in her touch, perhaps, disengaged the vital cord, and he "passed serenely into rest on the other shore of that mysterious sea that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a homeward sail."

The suddenness of his taking off is a circumstance not wholly without comfort. To one who is ready I can not but feel, with Ruskin, that death is the comforter and friend bringing in his right hand rest and in his left hope. It is not uncommon in our day to hear the desire expressed for a sudden death. Dr. Holmes once said, when he read of some one being taken off quickly, it made his mouth water. I am sure our departed friend in every way answered the description contained in the poet's lines, which voice my own feelings:

"When faith and patience, hope and love,
Have made us meet for heaven above,
How blest the privilege to rise,
Snatched in a moment to the skies;
Unconscious to resign our breath,
Nor taste the bitterness of death."

He is gone; but he left behind him for our instruction the lesson of a beautiful life of sympathy and service. To contemplate and emulate it is the only way to make it profitable to us. Death comes like a faithful schoolmaster, with the open book of a closed life, and assigns the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching. There is a "golden text" in the lesson of this dutiful and beautiful life which we may all study with profit.

And now, as we leave the contemplation of our departed friend, those who loved him best can carry with them the consolatory reflection "that, while green grass will cover his grave, blue skies bend over it, sweet birds sing near it, and the place will be hallowed ground, yet greener than the grass, fairer than the skies, sweeter than the birds, more hallowed than the grave itself will be his fragrant memory, enshrined with supreme sacredness in their heart of hearts."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. BROSIUS began in the early days of the Fifty-fourth Congress. A constituent of mine who bore the same family name as our departed friend, and who was a great admirer of his, charged me before I left home for the sapital to make his early acquaintance and inquire of him relative to the history of the family to which they both belonged.

I took the first opportunity that presented to introduce myself, and thus began an acquaintance which ripened into a friendship which, at least on my part, grew and strengthened through all the years that followed. I have never been brought into contact with a character which more deeply impressed me with its most striking characteristics of kindliness of heart and honesty of purpose than that of our departed friend, a character at once strong and vigorous, gentle and lovable.

I last saw him a few short weeks before he was called to his reward, as he stood here upon this floor to pay tribute to the memory of a departed colleague. The beautiful sentiments he then so eloquently uttered have a peculiar significance in that they were practically his last words on the floor of this Chamber, and one thought that he then expressed comes to me now as especially appropriate to this occasion when we are gathered to review the life work and pay tribute to the memory of this gallant soldier, good citizen, accomplished legislator, kindly and sympathetic man. He said on that occasion:

He is gone, but he left behind for our instruction the lesson of a beautiful life of sympathy and service, to contemplate and emulate it, is the only way to make it profitable to us. Death comes like a faithful schoolmaster with the open book of a closed life, and assigns us the lesson which we must study or lose its teaching. There is a "golden text" in the lesson of this dutiful and beautiful life which we may all study with profit.

When our departed friend uttered this beautiful sentiment, little did we think how soon his summons was to come "to join the innumerable caravan that moves unto the silent halls of death," or how appropriate the words he then uttered to the memory of one who had given a long and faithful service to his country would be on the occasion when the final tribute of love and affection should be paid to his memory.

While we are admonished again by the passing of our friend of the uncertainty of human existence, we are also reminded by the beauty of his life and character that for such a soul the end of usefulness here is but a translation to greater usefulness amid fairer fields and under brighter skies beyond, and that there shall follow him there the full fruitage of the seeds of loving-kindness and noble endeavor which he sowed with such unwearying hand throughout a busy and eventful life.

He is gone from among us in the flesh, but he is with us and shall remain to the end of time in the influences for good which he exerted here. This little span of mortal life is but the seed-time of existence—the seed time in which he scattered broadcast the seeds of beautiful thoughts and kindly and considerate action, which, like the pebble thrown on the mirrored bosom of the lake, radiates its influence in ever-widening, never-ending circles, the ultimate limit and extent of which only Omnipotence can know; and who can say to what far-distant age and clime the never-failing, never-ceasing, kindly, and helpful influence of our departed friend may extend, passing, with the souls which it has and shall influence, beyond the shores of time to break in soothing, cooling waves of loving sympathy upon the golden strands of a distant eternity?

We have missed him; we shall miss him more in the days to come, but the recollection of his service to his country and to his countrymen, the liberal contribution which he made of his talents in the cause of all that was "good, true, and beautiful," shall ever linger lovingly in our memory, and to us he shall be not as one dead, but as an elder brother, called by the Father of all to other fields of usefulness, leaving behind for our benefit forever the priceless legacy of a kindly influence, a good example, and an untarnished name.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, amid the ceaseless whirl of busy Congressional life we have paused a few short hours to-day to pay tribute to the memory of him who for more than a decade served the people of the county of Lancaster, my neighbors, so faithfully and so ably in the legislative halls of this nation.

Reverently and with sorrow I lay upon his bier a single humble flower, which I ask may be entwined in the wreath of memory we are assembled to weave to-day. This that his family, his friends, his people, and all may know that his neighbors who live in the land across the eastern border of the county of the red rose, through their Representative, bear testimony of the worth, the integrity, and ability of their chosen son, MARRIOTT BROSIUS, of his many excellencies in both private and public life, of the fact that they have ever appreciated him as a man and a faithful public servant.

As we parted at the dissolution of the Fifty-sixth Congress, all you who had been elected to serve in the coming Congress expected when that body assembled to meet the tall, dignified, and kindly chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Had we gone over the roll and picked out a score of those whom we had no doubt would survive the interim, Lancaster's representative would have been among that number, for he appeared to be the picture of health and strength, and we knew that his habits were such that he burned the candle of life with the greatest care and economy, and never at both ends. He gave every indication of many years of life being vouchsafed to him, and that a long and useful public career lay before him.

How we were shocked to hear of his sudden death before many of us had settled down to our regular avocations at home! A most insignificant accident, such that with the utmost care could happen to any one of us, a mere bump on the head, ended his life in the midst of its usefulness, when the long years of laborious preparation, unwearying study, and conscientious application gave him every reason to anticipate the writing of his name in bold letters still higher up the ladder of fame and successful achievement. By chance it fell to my lot to be one of his colleagues selected to attend his funeral and bear his body to its last resting place, and, although the day was a most inclement one, such an outpouring of the people of his district as we saw in the city of his home spoke more than words their great appreciation of the dead.

The hush and quiet that pervaded these great crowds, the whispered conversations, and the uncovered heads of the people as we passed, all bore convincing evidence that they had assembled out of no idle curiosity, but to pay their last homage to one whom they respected, honored, and loved; one to whom so often they had confided their voice and vote in the greatest lawmaking body of the greatest nation of the world.

That he had been faithful to his trust there could have been not the slightest doubt, and all seemed to whisper the "Well done, good and faithful servant."

MARRIOTT BROSIUS was a Quaker, descended from Quaker ancestry in great part; yet, strange as it may seem to those who are acquainted with the teachings of this peace-loving and strife-hating people, he had been a soldier and as a private answered his country's call when the war of the rebellion which found neighbor arrayed against neighbor and brother against brother waged its fiercest, and only after receiving a severe wound did he leave the field of bloody conflict.

He and others demonstrated a fact, firmly established in the annals of all our wars from the Revolution to that with Spain, that the offspring of the Quaker is first to offer his services to his country, ever steadfast in the time of danger and fearless on the field of strife.

Congressman BROSIUS occupied a leading position among the members of the House of Representatives when he died, a position earned by the possession of that key which alone opens the door of achievement and success—hard work.

No more industrious man could be found among those who served with him. His speeches, whether before this body, in a political campaign, at a banquet, or on special occasions, bore evidence of careful reading, thoughtful deliberation, and painstaking preparation. This detail work always made them worth listening to and worth reading. His great powers of elocution and the fervid earnestness with which they were delivered caused him to be sought on many occasions of national importance. I remember distinctly the oration he delivered but a few years ago at the celebration of the nation's Memorial Day at Arlington Heights, in my humble opinion the greatest of all his public deliverances. Added to this faculty, aye even fondness for hard work, he possessed striking integrity, great earnestness, and a deep love of country and of home.

He was constantly returned to Congress because it was recognized among the political leaders of his district that the people were behind him and with him, and no aspiring politician in later years even ventured to dispute his claim to be returned to Congress. So a nomination was always conceded to him without opposition, and this was equivalent to an election in that strong Republican county of Lancaster, which constituted his district.

He had opportunities which do not often come to men who are sent to Congress from Pennsylvania constituencies. The moral certainty that he could and would maintain his position, not for a term or two, but as long as his course gave satisfaction to the people he represented, as long as he remained prompt and faithful in the discharge of the duties and trusts confided to him.

He had, further, the assurances that expensive political fights at home would not force him to devote much of his time to professional business in order to support his family in comfort, and this gave him more time to devote to public work. Too often the high and honorable positions in the public service can be reached only by those who are wealthy and willing to make large investments in political campaigns, thereby excluding almost entirely the man dependent upon his ability and labor to earn a living.

The people of Lancaster County are to be congratulated upon their intelligent appreciation of the fact that the position of member of Congress is one of importance to them. That their Representative's standing is their standing in that body; that they are important only when he becomes important. They know that a place at the top is reached only by long years of successive service, for that ladder must be climbed step by step from the bottom round, and only by labor and care and application is the middle passed. Too often the people of Pennsylvania, by constant changes after very short terms of service, fail to maintain their proper position of influence at the nation's capital, and the State does not maintain a high rank among the great States of the Union who have long ago ceased to follow this policy.

Lancaster County has ever been a notable exception, and for this reason more than any other in the State and the nation she has maintained a commanding position.

MARRIOTT BROSIUS not only had these opportunities, but he used them to advantage and to the fame and distinction of his district. And when he wrote his name high up in the history of this nation's servants, at the same time he wrote the name of Lancaster on the same commanding plane.

She has good reasons to mourn his sudden and untimely death at the time of his greatest usefulness. But she has the consolation of knowing that him who she selected and honored most among her sons was in every way worthy of her choice. We know little of that life which lies beyond the river of death, over which all must pass, but we know—if we know anything—that after this short existence here, during which we have attained some growth both mental and moral, we will take with us our acquirements of head and heart to again take up the work of the hereafter in the worlds that are to come in the eternal and unending progress and development of life.

MARRIOTT BROSIUS has passed to that higher and broader life, and we know he has assumed greater duties and more higher responsibilities there.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that members of the House may have leave to print in the RECORD remarks upon the life, character, and service of Mr. BROSIUS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANDIS). Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The resolutions were then unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly, in pursuance of the resolutions, the House (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes) adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDALS, ETC.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to put in the RECORD a number of letters addressed to different persons in relation to certain decorations of certain officers in the service of the United States given by foreign governments, showing the reasons why the decorations had been given and furnished as evidence to show that it was proper and right for Congress to allow their acceptance. I ask that the letters be printed in the RECORD without reading, as the cases have been disposed of.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 16, 1902.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

SIR: In virtue of the provisions of section 3 of the act of Congress approved January 31, 1881 (21 Stat. L., 504), I have the honor to request that permission may be obtained from Congress for Lieut. Commander Asher C. Baker, United States Navy, and Frank W. Clarke, Curator, United States National Museum, to accept the decoration of the Cross of Knight of the Legion of Honor, and for Henry E. Alvord, Chief of the Dairy Division, Department of Agriculture; William A. Taylor, Pomologist, Department of Agriculture; H. W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture; M. A. Carleton, Cerealist, Department of Agriculture, and John I. Schulte, Assistant Agriculturalist, Department of Agriculture, to accept the decoration of the Ordre du Mérite Agricole, all tendered through this Department by the Government of the French Republic, and that this Department may be authorized to deliver the decorations to them.

These decorations were conferred in recognition of the important part taken by these gentlemen in the Paris Exposition.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 24, 1902.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, inclosing copies of Senate bills, as follows:

S. 1960, granting permission for Lieut. W. P. Scott, United States Navy, to accept a medal of merit presented to him by the Sultan of Turkey.

S. 1956, granting permission to Maj. Gen. John M. Schofield, United States Army, to accept the decoration of the Cross of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon him by the President of France.

S. 1573, to authorize Commander James M. Miller, United States Navy, Surg. Oliver D. Norton, United States Navy, and Mr. Edwin V. Morgan, formerly secretary of the Samoan Commission and now secretary of the legation of the United States at Seoul, Korea, to accept presents tendered to them by his Majesty the Emperor of Germany.

S. 1954, to authorize Capt. N. M. Brooks, Superintendent of Foreign Mails, Post-Office Department, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany.

S. 1955, to authorize George W. Hill, Chief of the Division of Publication of the Department of Agriculture, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Government of the French Republic.

S. 1957, granting permission to Mr. Hubbard T. Smith, secretary to the United States Commissioner to China and consular clerk of the United States, to accept a decoration conferred upon him by the Government of China.

S. 1953, granting permission to Commander William C. Wise, United States Navy, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany.

S. 1958, granting permission to Capt. C. De W. Willcox, United States Army, to accept the diploma and decoration of Officier d'Académie awarded to him by the Government of France.

S. 1670, granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla, United States Navy, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany.

S. 1959, granting permission to Capt. Stephen L'H. Slocum, United States Army, to accept a medal conferred upon him by the King of England.

S. R. 28, granting permission to Dr. Eugene Wasdin and Dr. H. D. Geddings, both of the United States Marine-Hospital Service, to accept decorations tendered to them by the Italian Government.

You request to be furnished with a definite statement of the facts connected with each of these cases.

In reply I have the honor to state that in the cases of Major-General Schofield, Commander Miller, Surgeon Norton, Mr. Edwin V. Morgan, Capt. N. M. Brooks, George W. Hill, Hubbard T. Smith, and Captain McCalla the Department has no other information than that already communicated to your committee by its letters of December 14, 1901.

I inclose copies of the correspondence containing all the information the Department is possessed of in the cases of Lieut. W. P. Scott, United States Navy, Capt. C. De W. Willcox, United States Army, Capt. Stephen L'H. Slocum, United States Army, and Dr. Eugene Wasdin and Dr. H. D. Geddings, of the Marine-Hospital Service.

The case of Commander Wise was, on the 22d instant, made the subject of a separate letter to you.

In regard to Senate bill 1573, I beg to inform you that Mr. Edwin V. Morgan, as is stated in this Department's letter to you of the 14th ultimo, is at present second secretary of the embassy of the United States to Russia, and not secretary of legation at Seoul, Korea.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 31, 1900.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose, for an expression of your views, copy of a personal and confidential note from the Italian ambassador at this capital, announcing the desire of his Government to confer certain decorations on Dr. Eugene Wasdin and Dr. H. D. Geddings, of the Marine-Hospital Service, for their services in investigating the nature of yellow fever.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

R. AMBASCIATA D'ITALIA, Washington, December 24, 1900.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I have just received communication from my Government referring to Dr. Eugene Wasdin, with the rank of major of the United States Army, and to Dr. H. D. Geddings, with the rank of captain, both belonging to the United States Marine-Hospital Service (Treasury Department). These two distinguished physicians, by order of the President, have just ended a scientific mission of the highest importance, which consisted in verifying and confirming the Italian studies and discoveries on the nature of yellow fever. Their work has required two years' researches and travels in the countries which suffer the most from that disease. By so doing they have undoubtedly deserved the consideration of my Government, which, as a token of its thankfulness for these services, should like to propose to the signature of His Majesty the King, my august sovereign, a decree conferring to Dr. Wasdin the cross of Officer of "SS. Maurizio e Lazzaro," and to Dr. Geddings the cross of Chevalier of the same order.

Before proceeding to this proposition, I wish to know whether nothing is opposed to it on account of their being at the service of the Government or of any other objection of any kind that may come to your knowledge.

I should be very much obliged to you if you will give me the required information and your advice in order to clear up the matter.

I am, my dear Mr. Hay, with the highest regards, faithfully, yours,

FAVA.

His Excellency the Hon. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 3, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your communication of December 31, 1900, inclosing copy of personal and confidential note from the Italian ambassador at this capital stating the desire of his Government to confer certain decorations upon Dr. Eugene Wasdin and Dr. H. D. Geddings of the Marine-Hospital Service for their services in investigating the nature of yellow fever.

In reply I have to inform you that this Department appreciates the honor conferred upon these officers, and has no objections to interpose to their acceptance of the same, subject to the consent of the Congress of the United States required by statute in such cases.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 24, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that this Department is in receipt, through the ambassador of the United States at London, of a South African war medal awarded by His Majesty King Edward VII to Captain Slocum, recent United States military attaché to South Africa.

Requesting that you will advise me as to the views of your Department with regard to application being made to Congress in December for permission for Captain Slocum to accept the medal,

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

DAVID J. HILL,
Acting Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 2, 1901.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 24th ultimo, respecting the South African war medal awarded by His Majesty King Edward VII to Capt. L'H. Slocum, Eighth Cavaly, United States Army, recently military attaché to South Africa, I have the honor to request that application be made to Congress in December next for permission for Captain Slocum to accept the medal in question.

Very respectfully,

WM. CARY SANGER,
Acting Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 17, 1901.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of correspondence on the subject of a medal presented by His Majesty the Sultan of Turkey to Lieut. W. P. Scott, United States Navy.

The Department requests the Department of State to obtain the necessary permission from Congress in order that Lieutenant Scott may retain the medal.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

J. D. LONG, Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

U. S. FLAGSHIP KENTUCKY,
Cavite, P. I., May 16, 1901.

SIR: I beg to inform the Department that, through the United States legation at Constantinople, I am in receipt of "liakat"—"medal of merit"—from His Majesty the Sultan of Turkey.

Through, apparently, an oversight this has been forwarded to me direct, with the inclosed letter from the United States chargé d'affaires, instead of through the customary channels of the State Department, etc., and I respectfully request instructions in regard to its disposition.

I have to request that the Department will secure the necessary legislative authority for me to accept and, on suitable occasions, to wear this medal, or will grant me permission to take the necessary steps to secure the same.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

W. PITT SCOTT,
Lieutenant, United States Navy.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Constantinople, February 16, 1901.

Lieut. WILLIAM PITT SCOTT,
U. S. S. Kentucky, care of Navy Department,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: At the request of the first secretary of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, I am sending you under separate cover the decoration (the order of merit) which His Majesty desires to confer on you as a token of his appreciation of the part which you played in the battle of Manila. His Majesty is informed that Congress has already conferred a medal on you, and he hopes that you will be permitted to accept a similar mark of distinction from him.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LLOYD C. GRISCOM.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 8, 1901.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter from Capt. C. De W. Willcox, Artillery Corps, United States Army, dated 28th ultimo, inclosing a diploma of Officier d'Académie, lately received by him from the minister of public instruction of France through the French ambassador, and, in accordance with the wishes of Captain Willcox and the requirements of law, to request that the Department of State obtain the necessary authority from Congress to enable Captain Willcox to accept the said diploma and the decoration accompanying it. The decoration, when received, will follow.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 28, 1901.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a diploma of Officier d'Académie, lately received by me from the minister of public instruction of France, through the French ambassador, and respectfully request that the War Department, through the Department of State, take the usual steps to secure from Congress the necessary authority for me to accept this diploma and the decoration accompanying it. The decoration has not yet been received by me, but as soon as it comes into my hands it will be deposited in the Department of State, in accordance with the requirements of law.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DE W. WILLCOX,
Captain, Artillery Corps.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY.

[Indorsement.]

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 1, 1901.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War, with recommendation that the State Department be requested to obtain the necessary authority from Congress to enable Captain Willcox to accept the diploma and decoration.

THOMAS WARD,
Acting Adjutant-General.

AMBASSADE DE LA REPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE AUX ETATS-UNIS,
Washington, le 21 Juin, 1901.

MONSIEUR: J'ai l'honneur de vous transmettre ci-jointe le brevêt d'Officier d'Académie que M. le Ministre d'Instruction Publique et des Beaux Arts vous a décerné sur la proposition de m. le Ministre de la Guerre.

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur, avec mes félicitations, les assurances de ma considération très distinguée.

JULES CAMBON.

Monsieur CORNÉLIS DE WILL WILLCOX,
Capitaine d'Artillerie, West Point, N. Y.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 11, 1901.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant and to inform you that this Department will, in accordance with the request therein contained, make application to Congress at its forthcoming session for the necessary authority to enable Capt. C. De W. Willcox, Artillery Corps, United States Army, to accept the diploma and decoration of Officier d'Académie awarded to him by the French Government.

The Department notices the statement made by Captain Willcox that as soon as the decoration comes into his hands it will be deposited in the Department of State in accordance with the requirements of law.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 10, 1901.

SIR: Referring to your letter of July 11, 1901, respecting an application to Congress for the necessary authority to enable Capt. C. De W. Willcox, Artillery Corps, United States Army, to accept the diploma and decoration of Officier d'Académie awarded to him by the French Government, I have the honor to forward herewith the decoration in question, which has just been received by Captain Willcox, together with an official copy of the letter transmitting it to the Adjutant-General of the Army, in order that it may be deposited in the Department of State in accordance with the requirements of law.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

WEST POINT, N. Y., December 7, 1901.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY,

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for delivery to the Department of State in accordance with the law, the decoration of "Officier d'Académie" granted me by the French Government. My application for official permission to accept this decoration, together with the appertaining appointment of "Officier d'Académie," is already on file in the Adjutant-General's Office.

I have but just received the decoration, else it would have been transmitted before.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DE W. WILLCOX,
Captain, Artillery Corps.

JAMES W. HANKINS.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill S. 2738, granting an increase of pension to James W. Hankins I present the affidavits of Dr. N. J. Rains, A. P. Winkler, and James L. Rowden, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The affidavits will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 2455) granting an increase of pension to George W. McClure.

Mr. FAIRBANKS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 11) to refer certain claims of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan to the Court of Claims for adjudication, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 715) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments and to submit a report thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, and to-morrow morning, after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take it up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3054) granting an increase of pension to Alice De K. Shattuck, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1845) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Washington," reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ESTATES OF M. A. PHELPS AND JOHN W. RENNER.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2123) for the relief of the heirs at law of M. A. Phelps and the heirs at law of John W. Renner, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask that it be put on its passage at the present time.

It is a bill involving $416, which, by mistake, was paid into the Treasury of the United States from one of the courts in Ohio, but which in reality should have stayed in the court for certain creditors of a bankrupt's estate, who had proved their claim against it. It was a mere mistake, and the judge——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my statement. The judge of the district court certifies to all the facts.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read, and then we will hear the explanation. I could not hear a word the Senator said. There were others talking in the Chamber at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $416.20 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid into the registry of the United States district court in bankruptcy for the southern district of Ohio, western division, to be used and disposed of under the direction of the United States district judge in Cincinnati, Ohio, to be applied in the payment of final dividends, as follows: In case No. 1100 in bankruptcy, in said United States district court, in the matter of the involuntary bankruptcy of Benjamin Homans, jr., to the personal representative of M. A. Phelps, deceased, $315; to the personal representative of John W. Renner, $101.20; said amounts having been, by misapprehension, paid the assistant treasurer of the United States at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. How was the money paid?

Mr. HOAR. The judge writes a letter to the Judiciary Committee stating that by sheer mistake these two little dividends, which belonged to these creditors, were paid into the Treasury of the United States. It takes an act of Congress to get the money out. The amount is $416 altogether.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the assistant treasurer at Cincinnati received it and accounted for it.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, he received and accounted for it, and the proposed statute provides that it shall be paid back to the court to be disposed of by the judge for the creditors entitled to it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN A. B. DU BARRY.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill (S. 1037) granting a pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry passed the Senate some two weeks ago. A similar bill had passed the House at the last session. The Senate bill was recalled because of a misapprehension that obtained in the committee at the time the report was made. It was recommitted to the committee, and I now report it back favorably, and, as it has passed the Senate twice, I ask that it be put upon its passage at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen A. B. Du Barry, widow of Beekman Du Barry, late brigadier-general and Commissary-General of Subsistence, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the words "per month," in line 9, the words "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry."

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGER.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Railroads, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. CARMACK introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 3453) for the relief of the estate of Solomon McKinnie, deceased;

A bill (S. 3454) for the relief of the Baptist Church at Tullahoma, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 3455) for the relief of the estate of Samuel McPherson, deceased;

A bill (S. 3456) for the relief of the estate of Edith Beard;

A bill (S. 3457) for the relief of estate of J. J. Brison; and

A bill (S. 3458) for the relief of George L. Whitmore (with accompanying papers).

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 3459) for the relief of the estate of Elizabeth McClure, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 3460) for the relief of the heirs of Joel S. Calvert; and

A bill (S. 3461) for the relief of William H. Roach.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 3462) for the relief of George P. Howard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 3463) for the relief of Valentine Lapham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3464) for the relief of Oscar B. Knight; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment proposing to allow each of the United States circuit courts of appeals to expend for law books $2,000 in each fiscal year, which amount is to be retained from any surplus which the clerks of said courts may be required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HALE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,800 for salary of a second secretary to the legation of the United States at Vienna, Austria, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the letter of Mr. John Hay, dated December 18, 1901, and addressed to Hon. ROBERT R. HITT, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, entitled "Concerning the exclusion of Chinese laborers," be printed as a document.

REPRINT OF RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, it was Ordered, That there be printed 200 copies of the last print of House bill 13189, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, known as the river and harbor bill, for the use of the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG.

Mr. McENERY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to William P. Kellogg, formerly a Senator from the State of Louisiana, the sum of $6,543.38, due him as a Senator of the United States in the Fortieth Congress, from the 4th of March, 1867, to the 24th of June, 1868, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MONUMENT TO COMMODORE PERRY IN JAPAN.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to send to the Senate so much of the reports of Rear-Admiral Rodgers and Rear-Admiral Beardslee as relate to the unveiling of the monument to Commodore Perry in Japan.

CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF DARIEN.

Mr. SCOTT. On Thursday, February 6, after the routine morning business, I shall desire to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 45) providing for a board to investigate the practicability of constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and I shall ask the Senate to indulge me while I make a few remarks thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will let the judicial bill be taken up, so far, at least, as to see whether it can not be passed.

Mr. SCOTT. I have simply given notice for February 6.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, some ten days ago the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate copies of certain correspondence relating to the Philippine tariff. I desire to know if there has been an answer by the Secretary of War to that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the answer has not yet been received.

Mr. CULBERSON. The junior Senator from Massachusetts at the time suggested that he had consulted an official of the insular department, so called, of the War Department, and he informed him the correspondence was there and ready, and would be promptly transmitted to the Senate. It seems to me, in view of the fact that this question is under discussion in the Senate, there is an unseemly delay in responding to the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I said the correspondence was there. I am quite certain I did not say it was ready for immediate transmission, because there is an immense mass of it that has to be prepared and put in order and arranged to send it in. I do not know how long it will take them. I only know they meant to prepare it and send it at the earliest possible moment. There is an immense amount of correspondence there, as I understood, in regard to the tariff. I do not think I said that it was all ready, for I had no knowledge that it was. I only knew that it was there in their possession.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 2978) for the relief of Joseph H. Penny, John W. Penny, Thomas Penny, and Harvey Penny, surviving partners of Penny & Sons;

A bill (H. R. 4471) for the relief of James M. Chisham;

A bill (H. R. 4988) for the relief of Mary E. McDonald;

A bill (H. R. 5094) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894; and

A bill (H. R. 5106) for the relief of Rasmussen & Strehlow.

The bill (H. R. 3104) to grant the right of way through the Oklahoma Territory and the Indian Territory to the Enid and Anadarko Railway Company, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) authorizing the transfer to the Library of Congress of the library of State reports, and so forth, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORT OF GEORGE I. ADAMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 4,000 additional copies of Bulletin No. 184, of the Geological Survey, lately issued, entitled "Oil and Gas Fields of the Western Interior and Northern Texas Coal Measures and of the Upper Cretaceous and Tertiary of the Western Gulf Coast," by George I. Adams, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House, and 1,000 for free distribution by the Geological Survey.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth of the Report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the Report of the Assistant Inspector-General on the State Homes, and 150 copies of the record of members, for the use of the Home.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up Senate bill 3287, to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

That on and after the 4th day of March, 1903, the salaries of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall be $7,500 a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada demands the yeas and nays on this question. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that while I think I should be in favor of an increase in the salaries of members of Congress in a bill by itself, I do not wish to vote for such a proposition as an amendment to a bill providing for an increase of the salaries of the judiciary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to state that I shall vote against the pending amendment; that if I were going to vote for the bill I should vote for the amendment; but as I propose to vote against the bill, I shall also vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to ask that the amendment may be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. STEWART.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word before the vote is taken.

I shall vote for this amendment, and shall then vote for the bill, whether or not the amendment is attached to it. I recall a very interesting incident when I was first elected to the Senate. An old farmer, who is a personal friend of mine, called on me, expressing gratification at the fact that I had been elected and saying he did not see how I was going to get along comfortably on $8,000 a year. When I informed him that the salary was $5,000 a year he said he thought I had better stay at home and attend to my business. I did not conclude to do so. I came to Washington, and for ten years have been getting along on $5,000 a year as best I could, but I am very well satisfied that no man in my State—farmer, mechanic, or professional man—will object to a reasonable increase in the salaries of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress. I think it is proper that at a time when we are proposing to increase the salaries of judges, some of whom are to-day getting more than twice what a Senator in Congress is receiving, we should be courageous enough and independent enough to vote a reasonable increase in our own salaries.

The salaries of Senators and Representatives have been increased since the foundation of this Government several times, and those increases have been made by men who were in the Senate and in the other House at the time the bills were presented. I think I am safe in saying that in all cases the increase was not as well guarded as it is in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], which provides that the increase shall not commence until the 4th of March, 1903.

All I desired to say, Mr. President, was that I believe the proposed increase is a fair proposition under existing conditions. If there is any reason on earth why the salaries of judges should be increased to the extent which is proposed in this bill, there is infinitely greater reason why the poor pittance that is paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in the other House should be increased to the extent that is proposed in this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill believing that the salaries of Representatives and Senators ought to be raised, and I should like no better issue to take before my people than that issue, but I do not think we are justified in raising our own salaries by an amendment to take effect as to Senators during the term for which they are elected, and for that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. He not being present, I will refrain from voting.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who, I understand, is detained at home by sickness. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY. I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I desire to know whether or not that Senator has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (after having voted in the negative). I ask whether the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. HANNA. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DEPEW (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. DEPEW. Then I withdraw my vote. If not paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senater from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. NELSON. I am informed that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], with whom I am paired, would vote against the amendment if he were present, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I did not hear my name called. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I refrain from voting, and announce my pair with that Senator.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Burton,	Gamble,	Kittredge,	Turner,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Quarles,	Warren,
Dubois,	Hawley,	Quay,	Wetmore.
Gallinger,	Heitfeld,	Stewart,

NAYS—44.

Bacon,	Deboe,	Kean,	Patterson,
Bard,	Dietrich,	Kearns,	Pettus,
Berry,	Dillingham,	Lodge,	Platt, N. Y.
Blackburn,	Dolliver,	McLaurin, S. C.	Pritchard,
Burnham,	Fairbanks,	McMillan,	Proctor,
Burrows,	Frye,	Mallory,	Simmons,
Carmack,	Gibson,	Martin,	Spooner,
Clapp,	Hale,	Mitchell,	Taliaferro,
Clay,	Harris,	Money,	Teller,
Culberson,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Cullom,	Jones, Ark.	Nelson,	Wellington.

NOT VOTING—28.

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Jones, Nev.	Penrose,
Allison,	Depew,	McComas,	Perkins,
Bailey,	Elkins,	McCumber,	Platt, Conn.
Bate,	Foraker,	McEnery,	Rawlins,
Beveridge,	Foster, La.	McLaurin, Miss.	Scott,
Clark, Mont.	Foster, Wash.	Mason,	Simon,
Cockrell,	Hanna,	Millard,	Vest.

So Mr. STEWART's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PERKINS subsequently said: I desire to announce that if I had been present I should have voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] increasing the salaries of Senators and Representatives. I was in the committee room at the time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and ordered to a third reading?

Mr. MONEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill?

Mr. MONEY. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the call of the yeas and nays when that stage of the bill is reached. The question now is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] was very anxious to offer an amendment in regard to the salary of the district judge for Porto Rico, and I suggested that if he would wait until the bill got into the Senate, that would be the proper time, when the general debate was over. I have sent for him in order that he may move his amendment. Meantime I will move that amendment in his behalf. I am not myself in favor of it, but in order that it may be proposed I will move it, so as not to delay the bill. I think the Senator from Ohio has already given notice of the amendment, and that it is at the Clerk's desk. If so, I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks have sent for the amendment, and it will be at the desk in a moment.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, I have here the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. It is in line 12, after the word "judges," to insert "including the judge of the district court of the United States for Porto Rico."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, on page 1, after the word "judges," it is proposed to insert "including the judge of the district court of the United States for Porto Rico."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to move that amendment for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who is, of course, very conversant with that matter, and who says that it is a very exceptional and pressing case.

Mr. FORAKER entered the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio has arrived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has just been read to the Senate. The bill is in the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] offered the amendment for the Senator in his absence.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill read after the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is added to it, so that we can see just what the proposition is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the clause which the Senator from Ohio proposes to amend.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will be better to read the whole bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if it is in order, I might say a word as to why I propose the amendment at this time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. This is an amendment increasing the salary of the district judge in Porto Rico, so as to make it the same as the salary of the district judges of the United States will be elsewhere throughout the United States under the provisions of this bill. It is simply including the United States district judge of the United States for Porto Rico. There is a reason for that, which I think the Senate will appreciate beyond any other reason that may be offered, in the fact that that post of duty is far removed from this country. The man has to quit all of his relations and affiliations here and go there in the discharge of the duties of that position. The duties are quite as important and quite as laborious, and the salary should be equal to the salary of the district judges throughout the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is, I suppose, familiar with the conditions as to the salaries paid to the United States judge in Porto Rico and the judge in Hawaii as well?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. What I want to know is whether the Senator knows any reason why the salary of the judge in Hawaii should not be put at the same figure that he proposes to make the pay of the judge in Porto Rico?

Mr. FORAKER. Perhaps there is no reason——

Mr. CULLOM. I think all of those salaries ought to be raised.

Mr. FORAKER. But there is this that has moved me: The United States district judge in Porto Rico has written me frequently on the subject, while the other judge has not written me at all. Porto Rico is a much more populous island than the Hawaiian Islands, and perhaps there is much more to do in Porto Rico than in Hawaii. At any rate, I have called attention to this matter and offered this amendment because I think, after having heard fully from that judge, that it is entirely a meritorious case.

Mr. CULLOM. That is perhaps true, but I think the cost of living in Hawaii is probably as great or greater than in Porto Rico.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the noise is so great in the Chamber that we can not tell what is going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HOAR. I think I can remove the difficulty of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. As I understand, the judge in Hawaii is a district judge of the United States, made so by the act creating the Territory. So he comes under the general description already, but I think the case of Porto Rico is different.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOAR. I do. I yield the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right there, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Illinois, or any other Senator who chooses to give light, as to whether Porto Rico is in the United States or not?

Mr. FORAKER. Porto Rico belongs to the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, well, "belonging" is not the question. "Being in" seems to be a different thing, and I should like to have the Senator elucidate the question.

Mr. FORAKER. I know Hawaii is in.

Mr. TILLMAN. We know Hawaii is in, because Hawaii has been annexed. We annexed Porto Rico also, but she seems to be out.

Mr. FORAKER. There is not any difficulty at all in fully answering the question of the Senator from South Carolina on another occasion, when we shall have more time at our disposal.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have all the time we want. We have the whole session before us, and we may just as well discuss this proposition on the bill to increase the salary of the Porto Rican judge as on any other bill.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from South Carolina persists in interrupting me every time I undertake to answer, I shall not be able to answer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I will sit down and let the Senator tell us whether Porto Rico is in the United States or not.

Mr. FORAKER. I will answer the Senator from South Carolina. His question is not attended with any difficulty at all, so far as I am aware, in making answer to it; but if we are to answer in the sense of entering into a prolonged discussion, it would necessarily take more time than I am disposed to take during the morning hour in the consideration of this question. We shall have ample opportunity to discuss all that hereafter.

For the present I content myself by simply saying that Porto Rico belongs to the United States, has relations well established, and relations that have been legislated about, and the legislation concerning which has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. I hope the Senator will let the amendment go through.

Mr. CULLOM. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I am inclined to think, is correct. If so, there is no occasion for an amendment raising the salary of the district judge in Hawaii.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I regret to differ with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] or the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and therefore I renew the proposed amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] by adding the words "and of Hawaii."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment proposed by Mr. FORAKER it is proposed to insert "and of Hawaii."

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether the judges in Porto Rico and Hawaii are appointed for life.

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; they are appointed for four years.

Mr. MALLORY. Then they are on the same plane as the ordinary Territorial judge?

Mr. FORAKER. A little bit different. The ordinary Territorial judge has local as well as Federal jurisdiction, while this is a judge who is distinctively a United States judge, in the sense that he has to do only with the jurisdiction as conferred directly by Congress, and he sits not only as a United States district judge, but also as a United States circuit judge.

Mr. MALLORY. But at the same time those judges do not have any local duties to perform as do the judges in the Territories that are organized, like Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. FORAKER. No, they do not; as I understand.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire further, Mr. President, at what figure does this amendment put the compensation of those two United States district judges.

Mr. FORAKER. If this amendment prevails, the same as the other United States district judges will receive, which is the present salary and 25 per cent addition thereto. I have not the figures, but I think it makes the salary something like $6,125.

Mr. MALLORY. That is considerably more than the Territorial judges get, I believe.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not informed as to that. I do not know just what they do get.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if we are going to raise the salaries of the Territorial judges of Porto Rico and Hawaii—for they are not United States judges within the meaning of the Constitution; if they were, they would remain in office for life—why not raise the salaries of the judges in Arizona, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Alaska? They do more work and have higher jurisdiction than do these judges, and they get about half the pay proposed now to be given to these new judges in Hawaii and Porto Rico.

So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to offer an amendment to this bill. I do not myself think it is a bill for which there is any great necessity. I think the judges of the United States are not paid extravagantly, but I think when we take up this question of fixing the salaries of judges, in common decency I might say, we ought to take care of the judges in Arizona, in New Mexico, and the other Territories of the United States as well as the two judges in Porto Rico and Hawaii who are dignified with a title which may seem a little higher than the others bear, but who have exactly the same relation to the Constitution and to the public that they have, except they may be sheared of some of the jurisdiction given to these other judges.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator that the reason of it probably is that which has been given here, that the Territorial judges have not written to any Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether those judges have written to any Senator, but it seems to me to be an unfair thing to pick out the judge in Porto Rico, who, of course, while he lives quite a distance from the United States, he is not as far from the national capital as the judge in Alaska, and has not got such a climate to live in; it does not cost him as much to get there, or to get home; he is not as far off as the judge in Arizona is from here, and there is not any reason that anybody can give why their salaries should be double those of the judges in Arizona and New Mexico.

If I had originally intended to vote for the bill, I should now have some question whether I would do so or not. I do not, however, intend to vote for it if it goes beyond the bill as it was introduced; and I am not certain that I shall vote for it then, because it seems to me, when you take up any part of the judges' salaries, you ought to do justice to the men who are holding court in our Territories. Living is more expensive in Arizona and other Territories than it is in either Porto Rico or Hawaii, a good deal more so, and there is more important litigation in Arizona and New Mexico than in either Porto Rico or Hawaii. I suppose our Territorial judges are not included because they do not have anybody here who has a special interest in them to move an amendment increasing their salaries.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, we can always rely upon it that nothing will escape the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. When I made answer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] that I had offered this amendment applying only to Porto Rico because my attention had been called only to that, I did not want to have him understand that the judge in Porto Rico had been importuning me about his salary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator to say that the judge there had written to him several letters on that very point.

Mr. FORAKER. I said that I had received several letters on this point from Porto Rico.

Mr. TILLMAN. What salary does the judge there get now?

Mr. FORAKER. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to do the Senator an injustice, but I understood him to say this very judge had been importuning him in a friendly way to get more money.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean to say that this judge had been importuning me in any improper way at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not in an improper way.

Mr. FORAKER. What I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, is entirely consistent, I think, with what I said a moment ago. If not, I will try to make it so, which is that I, being chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, naturally my attention has been called to that general situation; and, along with other matters to which my attention has been called, is the matter of the judge of the United States district court there, and when there was a proposition to increase salaries generally I heard from that judge, not in an importuning sense, but simply in a way entirely dignified and consistent with the dignity of the position he holds, calling my attention to his situation, that the cost of living is higher there than in the United States, the general jurisdiction that his court is invested with, and it was in that sense that I made that reference to him. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment may prevail.

So far as the judges in the Territories here are concerned, I do not want to say one word in argument against what has been advanced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. He is more familiar with that subject than I am; he knows better about their labors; he knows better than I do about their jurisdiction; he knows better than I do as to their compensation; and it may be he is entirely right about it all, and no doubt he is. I do not want to say anything in opposition to it, but I have presented that which seemed to me to fall properly within the sphere of my duty here. I have no objection to others presenting what they think proper to present.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I know something of the labor of the judges in a Territory like Oklahoma or a Territory like Arizona or New Mexico at this time, where large interests are involved. The judge in Oklahoma, which has a population not, of course, so large as down there, will have to do more than the judges in either Hawaii or Porto Rico, and he gets $3,000 and pays his own expenses when he travels about.

While Colorado was a Territory, realizing that the Government was not paying a reasonable sum, the Territorial legislature provided for an addition to the salary, which, I believe, up to the time we were admitted into the Union we continued to pay; but later the Department of Justice held that the judge had no right to get that compensation, I understand, and it was cut off. I do not know but that it was cut off before we were admitted into the Union.

I should like to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. If this thing is to be done; if it is to go beyond the purely Federal judges—the constitutional judges—then we ought to have the others brought in. I do not want to embarrass the bill, particularly, and yet I think either that ought to be done or the amendment for the other two judges ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am so anxious to see the salaries of the Federal judges increased, as proposed in this bill, that I am not willing to put in jeopardy at all its chances of passing and becoming a law. My only objection to this measure is that it does not increase the salaries 50 per cent instead of 25 per cent. I do not know any public officials who do more important work than the judiciary. I do not know anybody more entitled than they to at least a 50 per cent increase. I would more gladly support the bill if it made a 50 per cent increase than I shall with only a 25 per cent increase. But rather than put in jeopardy that which the bill does provide, by bringing on a discussion and undertaking to extend the provision of the bill to others not now included, I will, if allowed, withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment.

Mr. BATE. I was necessarily absent at one of the Departments when the yea and nay vote was taken this morning, and I desire, if the Senate will permit me, to have my vote recorded in the negative on the last roll call. I desire to have my vote recorded by unanimous consent, if it can be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair knows of no way by which that can be done under the rule.

Mr. BATE. Very well. I have made the application. If I had been present, I should have voted "nay."

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can accomplish what he proposes by stating how he would have voted, if present.

Mr. BATE. That I have already stated.

Mr. TELLER. The Senate has never allowed such a thing as he requests to be done.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Ohio having withdrawn his amendment, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. What becomes of the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It goes with the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which is to insert after the word "judges," in line 12, page 1, the words "and the judge of the United States district court of the Territory of Hawaii."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 12, after the word "judges," it is proposed to insert "and the judge of the United States district court of the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I was unavoidably detained from the Senate Chamber this morning in the discharge of other official duties. I entered the Chamber only a very few minutes ago, when I learned that this bill was under consideration, and I did not know until the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] addressed the Chair a moment ago that a vote had been taken on the question of increasing the salaries of Senators and Representatives.

I desire to say, not having the privilege of voting in regard to it, that if I had been here, I should have voted for such increase, not because of any personal consideration in connection with the matter, but simply as an act of justice. If there are any persons in this country who work harder than the judiciary I think it is the Senators and the Members of the House of Representatives, and I think they ought to do themselves justice in that matter. I know that in so voting I should only be voting my conviction and sense of duty on that subject.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Is not my motion pending?

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is pending.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw it with the understanding that when the Senator from Georgia shall have concluded I will renew it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the salary of the Chief Justice of the United States is $10,500 a year, and each associate justice draws a salary of $10,000 for life. We all know that outside of the President of the United States there is no officer in the United States, legislative, judicial, or executive, who draws a larger salary than does the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The Vice-President of the United States draws a salary of only $8,000 per annum. The Attorney-General, the legal adviser of the Government, draws a salary of only $8,000 per annum. The Secretary of State, representing us in our foreign relations, draws a salary of only $8,000 per annum, and the Secretary of the Treasury likewise draws a salary of only $8,000 per annum. With the exception of the President of the United States, no official within the United States draws a salary equal to that of the justices of the Supreme Court at the present time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator from Georgia a moment ago to say that no officer of this Government, inside or outside of the United States——

Mr. CLAY. I am coming to that point. I will say there is an exception. I meant within the United States, properly speaking.

Now, there is an exception. The members of the Taft Commission, I understand, draw a salary of $20,000 per annum each and are allowed a house to live in. Thirteen thousand dollars per annum, I believe, will be the salary of the Chief Justice of the United States if this bill passes, and each associate justice will draw a salary of $12,500. To-day, in many instances, even the district judges of the United States are as hard pressed with work as are those of the Supreme Court. It does strike me, taking into consideration the salaries we pay all our officials—legislative, executive, and judicial—that it is manifestly unjust to pass this bill increasing the salary of the Chief Justice from $10,500 to $13,500 and of the associate justices from $10,000 to $12,500. I do not believe the increase can be justified under such circumstances.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has it $500 too much. It is $12,500 and $13,000.

Mr. CLAY. I understand the Chief Justice, under this bill, will draw a salary of $13,500.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. CLAY. Thirteen thousand dollars. The associate justices will draw a salary of $12,500.

Mr. President, I have never been niggardly when it came to fixing the salaries of judges. I do not believe that the salaries of Senators and Representatives to-day are as large as they ought to be. Yet it is proposed to fix the salary of a judge of the Supreme Court at $12,500 and the salary of a Senator at $5,000, while the Senators are equally as much worked as are the judges of the Supreme Court.

I have no reflections to cast on the Supreme Court. It is the highest judicial tribunal of our Government. If a judge reaches 70 years of age he can retire on a salary of $10,000 per annum, and if this bill becomes a law he can retire upon the increased salary. It would cost probably $1,500 or $2,000 per annum to get an insurance policy for the sum of $10,000 on a man's life after he is 70 years of age. I do not believe that the report of the committee ought to be adopted or that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to make a statement?

Mr. HOAR. If it is to be a mere statement. I have a motion to lay the amendment on the table on which I should like to insist.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish to make a mere statement.

Mr. President, I voted for the amendment to increase the salaries of Senators and Representatives. We all know they ought to be increased, and I shall vote for it every time I have an opportunity. I shall vote for the bill presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] will amend his amendment so as to include all the Territories, I shall vote for it. It is pleasant for me to say this, so that my old associates will know that I have not forgotten some of my training.

I can not vote for the amendment for Hawaii alone, because there are not 125,000 people in all those islands. There are not 6,000 white people there, and that judge can not do the work our Territorial judges do. Therefore I shall vote to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I renew my motion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Massachusetts, in view of the remarks just made. I will say that the Senator forgets, perhaps, that we have in Hawaii, in addition to the United States district judge, for whom I have provided, a Territorial court and a Territorial supreme court, corresponding in all respects to our Territorial courts upon the mainland. The United States court for which my amendment provides is exactly the same as the United States district courts in the various States of the Union, except that the judge thereof is appointed for only four years, while the United States district judges on the mainland are appointed for life. The jurisdiction is exactly the same, but the work is very much harder.

Mr. HOAR. I renew my motion,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I decline to yield any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I have no amendment to offer, but I should like to make a few remarks upon this bill.

I do not see how the adjustment of salaries can be made according to the work done. In the State of Mississippi there are two Federal districts, but only one Federal judge. That Federal judge gets $5,000 per annum, and he does the work of both districts, and he sits in five different places. The admiralty business is a good deal, and violations of the revenue laws make great business. The State has over a million and a half inhabitants. The judge is a very competent man. He is a fine lawyer. He is a good man in every respect, and if we should salary him according to the labor he does he should have more than $5,000. But we can not undertake to go into that sort of business.

I have been in the Territorial courts. I have seen the judges there take up United States business one week and then take up the local or Territorial business next week; and I know the labors they perform. They are very considerable, and necessarily they require men of ability, men who ought really to make a great deal more at the practice than they make on the bench. In fact, it can be said of almost every man who is fit for a Federal judgeship that he will make more money practicing than he will in the exercise of his functions as a judge.

I voted a few minutes ago against raising the salaries of Members and Senators. It was not because I do not believe they ought to have more. I think they should. There are a great many Senators here who care nothing about their salary. When compared with their incomes from outside sources the salary is a mere bagatelle. But there are a great many other Senators, especially from my section of the country, who find difficulty in living in Washington on their salaries. They can not live as the other Senators do at all. I have known Senators who gave their whole salaries to their private secretaries, and it was nothing. They did not feel it. We can not, of course, undertake to make a difference between Senators, but I think they should have more than they are receiving, because they do more work and the expense of living is great. The same can be said of Representatives, though not in the same degree.

But I oppose raising the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court. I think $10,000 a year, with provision that they may retire after ten years' service or after attaining the age of 70 years, is quite sufficient to maintain their station in life and their social status to which their position entitles them. I do not see any reason, particularly, why they should have their salaries raised. It is a life position, and it is a very unfortunate feature, I think, of their tenure of office that it is for life.

Now, I am not astonished that the members of the Taft Commission get $20,000 a year apiece, nor that they have a house furnished them; and I would not be surprised if they got $50,000 apiece. In fact, I am like Lord Clyde was when a committee of the House of Commons waited upon him to tell him that he was about to be impeached. Clyde looked at them and said, "Why, gentlemen, I am astonished at my own moderation when I consider my opportunities and my own irresponsibility."

I do not see why the members of the Taft Commission should be limited to $20,000 or any other sum or why we should cavil about it. I do not care about it myself. It is nothing particularly to me. But why the President should not have given them all they want or anybody else all he wants I do not know, because we have never taken any trouble to limit anybody. We have given him the liberty to appoint as many officers as he chooses, to appoint them for as long a tenure as he chooses, and, so far as I know, to fix any salary he chooses. There is nothing to be said in complaint of that, because we are estopped by our own act in abdicating the power to do anything and putting it all in the hands of the President of the United States.

Now, if some gentleman will bring in an independent bill here, raising the salaries of Senators and Representatives, you will find a different vote from that recorded this morning on an amendment to a bill granting an increase of salaries to the judges.

I think the judges are getting very good salaries, and as the office is for life, with no responsibility to anybody, as there should be, for notwithstanding the independence of the coordinate departments of the Government I believe in going back to the people as the source of all authority, I shall vote against the whole proposition and all the amendments to it. I am sorry the bill was ever reported here at all. On the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill anything can be put which the Committee on Appropriations thinks proper and right, and it can be subjected, along with the salaries of all the subordinate officers of the Government, to revision by the Senate and House.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] who has just taken his seat, and by others here, one thing occurs to me that has not yet been presented. When the Senators were elected and the judges were chosen and took their seats they all understood what their compensation was to be. They have drawn that compensation regularly up to this time and were satisfied with it. Now, this is a question that has never been mooted in any canvass before the people. It has not been considered by them at all, and they should certainly be heard upon a matter of this kind, especially as they are the taxpayers of our country, out of whom comes these salaries.

I think, Mr. President, that the present salary is sufficient, so far as it applies to some of the judges; sufficient for them to support themselves and families properly and wear the official honors gracefully and with dignity, and also to lay aside something for a rainy day if it is necessary. But there are some judges who, in my opinion, are not sufficiently compensated. The circuit and district judges of this country do the hard work, and their salaries are less, much less, than those of the Supreme Court.

If any judicial salary should be increased it is the salary of those judges who are known to perform the hardest work, especially the district judges, but I am against any. If, however, Mr. President, ever there was a time when an advance in salaries should be made, it seems now is the time, as everything is on a high key in the way of prices. It costs more to live now than any time of recent years. Money flows here almost like water, especially that money which belongs to the Government. The purse strings of this nation never were held so loosely as now. There never, perhaps, was so much compensation for official services as there is now. There never was such a general extravagance and flow of money as there is in this country to-day.

There is no justification for us in giving an increase in the salaries of the men who already have ample fixed salaries and who have enjoyed those incomes for years, and not only hold them as life estates but draw full salaries after they have attained a certain age and ceased to perform official duties.

A judge of the Supreme Court, permit me to say, has a life estate, and that I regard as the highest and best feature for him. One of the complaints is that when persons who serve the Government get old they have nothing laid by for old age, and they are not prepared to take care of themselves or their families. Hence the pensions you see here multiplying by the thousands every day, and the increase of pensions.

The judges bear different relationship, however, to the Government than any other persons, because when the service of the judge expires, and that is a material point, when they have served upon the bench ten years and their terms expire by age, they can then draw their salaries just the same as they did before the ten years had expired. Therefore they are provided for for life and their families are provided for during their lives, and after they have ceased to perform official duties, draw from the Government full pay. Hence there is not that occasion for an increase that there is with the ordinary man who seeks a pension that furnishes him a bare living.

With this view of it I shall vote against the whole proposition, and especially would I have voted, if I had been in the Chamber when the vote was taken, against the proposition to increase the salaries of Senators and Representatives. I admit that perhaps they are not compensated like some other officers, but, as I said, this has not been brought before the taxpayers—never been mooted nor canvassed—who have a right to be heard upon so radical a change as this. I shall vote against it on that ground if on no other.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as we are discussing our judiciary—provincial, insular, and continental—I hope I shall be pardoned for calling the attention of the Senate to a statement that is so remarkable that I think it needs explanation by somebody. I did not know that the officers involved had any friends at court, but it seems they must have some friends somewhere, because of the most extraordinary condition existing, which I think needs explanation from some source.

I hold in my hand this morning's Washington Post. The Post, by the way, is a very fair and clean newspaper. We all recognize that, and it does not deal in that irresponsible literature which sometimes finds its way into the public press. Therefore when I see anything in the Post, I give it some respectful attention. It gets off the handle once in a while and makes mistakes, but not intentionally. I see on the first page a good long article headed—

Kept on pay rolls—Court officials of Alaska have a strong pull.

We all know the meaning of the word "pull." You have to pull somebody's leg in Washington in order to be able to accomplish what these men are doing. It goes on in the headlines:

Betrayed their trust—Fined and sentenced to jail, but still draw salaries—Political influence at Washington supposed to be more potent than the rulings of the United States court of appeals at San Francisco—Judge Morrow has a conference with the Attorney-General, and puts him in possession of facts in the case.

One of our circuit judges has to come all the way across the continent in order to break up the pull or put some machinery in motion to make it run less smoothly.

The body of the article is as follows:

The Federal pay rolls for Alaska probably present the most unique condition ever found in the records of the American judiciary. District Judge Arthur H. Noyes, who was fined $1,000 for his participation in a most remarkable conspiracy at Nome, is in Mount Zion Hospital, at San Francisco, a private institution, as violently ill, according to current reports, as others concerned in the Nome conspiracy have been on occasion when justice was overtaking them.

They all get sick.

Instead of being cut off from Government support, after the scathing censure of the circuit court of appeals in San Francisco, he continues to draw pay at the rate of $5,000 a year, and, as he is absent from Nome, $10 a day additional for expenses. While seeking delay through appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States his compensation from the Government since the decision of the court at San Francisco was rendered has nearly equaled the fine the court imposed for an offense which Justice Ross, one of the highest judicial authorities west of the Mississippi, declared from the bench ought to have been a sentence to jail for eighteen months.

RECEIVES HIS MONEY, ALTHOUGH IN JAIL.

That is not all. United States District Attorney Joseph K. Woods, by his own confession implicated in the conspiracy, was given a light sentence of four months in jail by the United States circuit court of appeals in San Francisco. The brief imprisonment was in view of his confession.

He turned State's evidence, so to speak.

He is now serving out that sentence, but while he languishes in jail he is still on the pay rolls at the rate of about $5,000 a year.

Moreover, C. A. S. Frost, who went out from Washington some months ago as the special agent of the Department of Justice for the express purpose of ferreting out the situation at Nome and truthfully reporting the same to the authorities here, but who joined forces with Judge Noyes and District Attorney Woods soon after he arrived there, is at liberty in this city. His salary of $2,500 as private secretary to Judge Noyes, a position that he graduated to by successive stages after he reached Nome, an intermediary stage being that of assistant United States district attorney, still runs on. Although he is under sentence of one year in jail, every day that goes by means the taking of additional dollars from the Federal Treasury as compensation for his services.

This is very interesting reading, but some Senators do not seem to feel disposed to listen to it. I was anxious to get it before the country in that daily paper which we send forth from here, embracing the eloquence and learning and all of those other things which we dish up here in our sittings. The article continues:

He has been allowed to remain at large for thirty days, pending Judge Noyes's appeal, which, good lawyers say, can hardly have any other fate than being thrown out of court by the United States Supreme justices. At least that was the fate of a similar appeal by Receiver Alexander McKenzie, who was sentenced for contempt because of similar offenses.

Right here, it seems to me, it is very apropos to call attention to the fact that these little satrapies we are creating around in the Caribbean Sea and over in the archipelago in Asia, where the Spanish language alone is spoken, involves a condition of secrecy or rather of pitiable inability and helplessness on the part of these subjects of ours to make known their oppressions or their wrongs that ought to give us pause.

Here we have in our own blessed country of Alaska these officials, appointed by the President and confirmed by this body, who not only have indulged in peculation or some other conspiracy against decency and good morals and honesty—I do not know the particulars—but when the special agent of the Department of Justice goes there, the Department says, in regard to this infamy, that he joined forces with the thieves—shall I call them? What are they? He returns here to serve his sentence because he entered into collusion with the scoundrels; and all the time he goes on drawing his per diem, or his salary, whatever it is, while the men whom he assisted in their villainy are also on the pay rolls of the Government; and nobody seems able to stop it. There is a reason why, I presume.

The while these large salaries go on, the business interests at Nome—and they are very large, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars—have been clamoring for a pure and honest judge, before whom litigation can be taken with some degree of confidence.

Our people abroad, our subjects or fellow-citizens, or whatever other status they may occupy, will soon be, like Diogenes, hunting up and down the world with a lantern for an honest judge.

An influential coterie of politicians, however—

I wish they would specify. I presume the man who wrote this, and who may be in the gallery, would give the facts to the Judiciary Committee if they would investigate the case; and I think somebody ought to prepare a resolution directing that committee to call him before them and get at these facts and see who this coterie of influential politicians are who are putting off on us these scoundrels as judges, and who are now protecting those who are drawing their salaries while they are going through a pro forma appeal to the Supreme Court.

An influential coterie of politicians, however, is wielding an influence that is amazing. All these men come from the West, and by quiet but forceful methods have been able to block progress at every turn in this most remarkable judicial incident, than which, if the printed decision of the circuit court of appeals and the statement of reliable men are to be taken, nothing more disgraceful ever darkened the history of the Federal courts.

Circuit Judge Morrow, who, with Judge Gilbert and Judge Ross, imposed the sentences for contempt, has been in Washington for a few days on business connected with the Carnegie Institute, of which he is one of the trustees. To his friends here Judge Morrow talked with some frankness of his surprise that such a notorious case as that of Judge Noyes and the others, which the court expressly declared to be a corrupt conspiracy, could be treated with such leniency.

By the way, whose business is it to remove this scoundrel, this convicted thief? Where does the executive power lie to relieve those oppressed people in Alaska of this infamy, of this travesty on justice?

Every contemplated move of the Government has been delayed by the interposition of politicians, who have hovered near Washington and urged something in extenuation of the offenses. Efforts have been persistent to cast reflection upon the judicial attitude of the court at San Francisco, notwithstanding the high character of the judges composing it.

An instance in point is the case of Dudley Duboise—

I do not think he spells his name like our honored colleague here, for he has an "e" at the tail of it, so I will add the sound of "a" to it as a differentiation of South Carolina French. [Laughter.]

An instance to the point is the case of Dudley Duboise, the attorney for McKenzie, who was adjudged in contempt.

Mr. BACON. I wish to inform the Senator that the name is Dubose. The "i" is improperly there.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, it is Dubose. I am corrected by my French colleague from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Dubose happens to be from Georgia. That is the reason why I know the name.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have thieves down our way as well as they have up here and up North.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that while, of course, it is very well to have levity, so far as he connects the name of Mr. Dubose with anything of that kind he is absolutely without authority or justification.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not intend to do anything except to read what is stated here.

Mr. BACON. The Senator does not intend it, but still, in order to raise a laugh, he does connect him with it, and I say there is not a particle of justification for it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I desire to say that Mr. Dubose formerly lived in Georgia and I served as a member of the legislature with him for a few years. He was an upright and honorable man. He had the respect and esteem of the people of Wilkes County, which he represented, and he had the respect and esteem of the entire membership of the legislature in which he served.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator would have found, if he had waited until I got to it, that Mr. Dubose has only been guilty of advising somebody to resist what might appear to be the dishonesty or some other deviltry that this judicial robber has been engaged in up there.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, with pleasure. I want somebody to explain. I am just hunting for light. I am like Diogenes holding the lantern up here trying to investigate a judiciary that are rotten.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator need not take his seat. I only wanted to ask a question for information. I do not know anything more about these matters than the Senator, and he does not seem to know anything except what he finds in a paper, and he did not seem to know he was referring to somebody from his part of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would jump on him just as readily if he was from South Carolina, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no doubt of that, but I want to know, as the Senator proceeds, what it is we are taking proof about. As I understand the Senator, he began to read and was commenting upon an article. Mr. Dubose, a gentleman of unquestioned character, is, I understand, the counsel——

Mr. TILLMAN. He is attorney in the case, and had a right, of course, to do what he chose to do in that behalf.

Mr. FORAKER. And this man of high character advised these defendants to prosecute an appeal, insisting that they are not guilty of any offense, and they are entitled, of course, to the appeal. The Senator wanted to know a while ago where the authority rested to remove judges who had been found guilty in a lower court of some offense that this counsel thinks they are not guilty of. I want to remind the Senator that the way to remove a judge is when the House presents articles of impeachment here. We can then sit in judgment. I do not know of any other way to remove him unless there is some statutory provision, and I rose to inquire whether or not there is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did not the President remove the governor of Oklahoma the other day because there was some work similar to this done?

Mr. FORAKER. But the governor of Oklahoma did not hold a judicial position.

Mr. TILLMAN. But this is Territorial.

Mr. FORAKER. He was appointed, I suppose, for four years.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only seeking for light.

Mr. FORAKER. I am searching for light, too, and the inquiry I make is whether the way to remove judges is not by impeachment. Is there any other way?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina if he will allow me a moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, with pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. The power of the President is and has been ample to remove a Territorial judge, and that has been settled for more than fifty years by the Supreme Court. There is no case where a Territorial judge has ever been impeached. There has never been any necessity for it. In my experience in the West I can name at least a dozen judges who have been removed. There is not any question of it.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not making any question on that point; I was simply inquiring for information. Now, that being true, I do not know why this case has not been acted upon except only upon the theory advanced by Senators who have spoken for the learned counsel of these persons that there may be some question which is not yet settled. I think we can all safely say that there is an occupant of the White House who, if there be shown a lack of integrity on the part of any official, would not hesitate to remove him, but, on the contrary, would do it instantly and with great pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me just a moment further, I wish to state that more than a year ago the court of appeals of the ninth circuit administered to this man a rebuke that was unequaled in the history of the judges of courts of the United States, and they did it unanimously. The tool of this judge, into whose hands he had put all the property, practically, in the vicinity of Nome, without bond in many cases, taking property from the owners that was not described or named in the bills, they put in jail for a failure to comply with the mandate of that court. That was as well known to the Senate then as it is known now, and there never has been and could not be any question of the power of the Executive to remove him at any time.

I know at least one Senator, and more, too, for that matter, who repeatedly urged on the then, not the present, Attorney-General to remove this man. I know that the governor urged his removal and said, "If you can not remove him, for heaven's sake send him to some other district." Men whom I know personally and have known for twenty-five years have told me of the outrages of this judge, and have said to me in the most positive terms that if it had not been for the United States Army there they would have hung him to one of the trees of that district.

Now, Mr. President, this has been a crying shame. The people of that country have been without judicial law for more than fifteen months, and the recital of the outrages that that man has committed under the power conferred upon him would startle the American people, for I declare there has been no instance like it in the whole history of American jurisprudence from the very earliest settlement of the country to the present time.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, there went a great many people from my State to that district, among others at least a dozen from my town, who are as reputable men as there are in any place in the United States. They told me, without exception, everyone of them, that if a man would locate a claim up there somebody else would jump that claim, and it was almost the custom that some one else would jump the claim who had not the slightest title to it; that there was no cause for jumping the claim, and the original locator was compelled to divide with this man or the judge would take it away from him entirely.

I think every Senator from a Western State could give a mass of testimony of this sort. The conditions up there have been simply frightful. I intended at some time to call the attention of the Senate to it. I did not suppose that the question would come up in this way.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator call the attention of the Executive to it?

Mr. DUBOIS. I have not done so as yet; but that is the universal testimony of men who have gone out to that country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before I pass on, I desire to say that but for the misspelling of the name by sticking an "i" in, I would have known, both from the surname and the name—something at least which would have given me an inkling as to who this attorney, Dudley Dubose, is. He is the grandson of a man who once graced this Chamber, and I presume from his blood that he is about as high and clean as the average lawyer. Dudley Dubose is a grandson of Col. Robert Toombs.

Mr. BACON. And a son of a former Representative in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. I therefore say that I do not presume he is a man in collusion with these besmirched officials. I do not want to do him any injustice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina will please suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I omitted when the bill first came up to do what I intended to do—to move the first committee amendment, so as to have the amendments of the committee regularly before the Senate. I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Philippines, has reported an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] desires to go on to-day.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I have indulgence for a moment, just to finish the explanation I was making?

Mr. LODGE. I have nothing to do with what the Senator from South Carolina chooses to inject here. He, of course, is at liberty to do anything he pleases. The bill, which is the unfinished business of the Senate, comes up at 2 o'clock. All I can do is to announce, as happens to be the case to-day, that a Senator, on behalf of the minority, is ready to proceed on the bill which is before the Senate. I can not prevent the Senator from South Carolina or anybody else from shutting him off by talking about irrelevant matters.

Mr. TILLMAN. With the indulgence of the Senator from Tennessee, I will finish the explanation I was making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the Chair to have the amendment stated.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no speech to make. I wanted to have the personal explanation completed, but of course I can put it in hereafter.

Mr. CARMACK. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, continuing what I was going to say when I was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour and the unwillingness, apparently, of the Senator from Massachusetts to permit me to finish the explanation, I wish to say that in mistaking, by reason of the wrong spelling, the identity of a man of whom I know something, I desire, as the article itself sets forth, to declare that there is nothing in the conduct of Mr. Dubose, even as the article presents it, which reflects on him in any degree.

As I had apparently cast some reflections on him, I would desire to withdraw those, as one man of honor will always do in dealing with another, and to state that he only advises his clients to do certain things, as he advised some officer in Alaska to do some other certain thing, for which he was adjudged in contempt. Therefore he is not in any way charged with dishonest, dishonorable, or unjudicial conduct, or whatever other crimes these officers of the court have been guilty of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask permission to put in the RECORD the entire article from this morning's Washington Post, so that the whole article may be before us when this matter comes up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

By some means the conviction was conveyed to Washington that the circuit court had adjudged him guilty because he advised his client (McKenzie) contrary to what was subsequently the decision of the court at San Francisco.

When the certified copies of the decision were consulted it was found that Dubose had not been sentenced for that offense at all, but for making a speech in a public hall at Nome advising the people there, who were not his clients, to resist the writs issued by the circuit court at San Francisco. Furthermore, he advised the military commander at Nome, Maj. John T. Van Orsdale, in charge of the detachment of Federal soldiers stationed there, to resist the writs of the circuit court. It was for those offenses that the circuit court sentenced him.

The remarkable incident will be brought to a close soon, it is expected, for no one questions the determination of President Roosevelt and Attorney-General Knox to act as soon as they can get authoritative information. The circuit court's decision was rendered January 6, and a few days ago Mr. Knox secured for the first time a certified copy of the decision. Judge Morrow, who left for the Pacific coast yesterday, called at the Department of Justice late last week regarding another matter, but incidentally discussed the case at some length with the Attorney-General, who was put in possession of knowledge regarding the conspiracy which had not previously reached him. Others have arrived in Washington, or will soon, who can tell him and the President some political and business aspects of the case which have not appeared in the judicial decision.

M'KENZIE GAVE UP THE GOLD DUST.

When the late President McKinley was in San Francisco he had a consultation with Judge Morrow, prior to the pardon he granted to McKenzie, who was then in jail for contempt. Not long afterwards Mr. McKinley mentioned to certain of his friends that in all his long political career he had never before been subjected to such tremendous pressure from influential men as he had been to pardon McKenzie, who, by the way, is a member of the Republican National Committee.

Judge Morrow refused to recommend the pardon of McKenzie until he had turned over some $9,000 in gold dust to the owners. Telegrams were exchanged with Washington, it is asserted, that McKenzie had settled in full. Judge Morrow by telegram denounced that statement as utterly false. Later McKenzie did give the order for the transfer of this gold dust, and subsequently was pardoned by the President.

While McKenzie was languishing in jail he was represented as being at death's door. A few hours after his release he was observed by a reliable eyewitness, now in Washington, sprinting down the Southern Pacific Railway depot platform in Oakland to catch a train and showing no evidence of ill health.

The comment of Judge Gilbert in the decision of the circuit court sentencing C. A. S. Frost, formerly special agent of the Department of Justice, and now enjoying himself with his friends in Washington, to twelve months' imprisonment in the Alameda County jail, this opinion being concurred in by Judges Morrow and Ross, except that the latter thought the sentence ought to be fifteen months in jail, goes into a detailed review of Frost's operations at Nome.

INTIMATE WITH NOYES AND M'KENZIE.

Frost held office as special examiner of the Department of Justice till September 15, 1900, when he resigned to become assistant attorney to Joseph K. Wood. The opinion tells how Marshal Vawter gave direct testimony declaring that the relations between Judge Noyes, McKenzie, and Frost were intimate, and that Frost, on September 15, 1900, told him that the writs of supersedeas issued by the court at San Francisco were void. Vawter also has a letter which Frost wrote him giving authority to incur unusual expenses incident to the swearing in of a posse comitatus to prevent the delivery of gold dust, as directed by the circuit court at San Francisco.

"There are other facts, fully proven," continues the court, "which show the deep personal interest Frost had in the McKenzie receivership and his partisanship in the controversies then pending." Judge Gilbert, in the decision rendered by the court, goes on to cite how Frost, "in violation of his duties as an officer of the United States, and for the purpose of aiding McKenzie, employed on behalf of the United States three detectives," who were engaged to watch the movements of the defendants in the litigation before the court. His excuse for employing these men are mentioned, but the court says there is positive and direct evidence concerning the purpose for which the detectives were paid out of Government funds, and the purposes were not those mentioned by Frost in his testimony. One of these detectives had a bill for $900. The decision of the court concludes with this language:

GROSSLY BETRAYED THE GOVERNMENT.

"George V. Borchsenius, the clerk of the court, testified that he objected to the payment of the bills of these detectives for the reason that he did not think they were proper bills, but that Judge Noyes ordered him to pay them immediately, and said to him that he could either pay them or be in contempt of court. The whole of the evidence concerning the case of Frost convinces us beyond any reasonable doubt that he not only aided and abetted to the utmost of his power the efforts of McKenzie to obstruct the execution of the writs of supersedeas, but that in his official capacity he grossly betrayed the interests of the United States which were intrusted to his care."

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Philippines, to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That upon all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 75 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid: And provided further, That the rates of duty which are required hereby to be levied, collected, and paid upon products of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States shall be less any duty or taxes levied, collected, and paid thereon upon the exportation thereof from the Philippine Archipelago, as provided by the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but all articles, the growth and product of the Philippine Islands, now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty and exported from said islands for use and consumption in the United States, shall be hereafter exempt from any export duties imposed in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, a proper consideration of the measure now before the Senate involves the whole question of our policy in the Philippine Islands. There is no argument that could be made touching the conquest of that archipelago and the subjugation of its people, touching the whole policy of colonial empire and the arbitrary government by a free republic of a vassal province and a subject race, that would not be pertinent to this bill.

A minority of the committee have refused to consider it as a mere question of revenue, of rates of duty, of forms and methods of taxation. It has presented itself to them rather as a characteristic manifestation of a policy born of utter selfishness, utter greed, and an utter contempt for the principles of American liberty.

Mr. President, if taxation without representation be tyranny, if the power to tax is the power to destroy, if abuse of the taxing power has been a ready instrument of tyranny in every age and country of the world, then there is no fitter field upon which the opponents may challenge the advocates of this policy to battle than upon the passage of this bill. I shall not attempt to discuss its merits as a revenue measure. I frankly confess that I am not prepared to do so. I frankly confess that I have not studied the elaborate system of rates and duties which are present, though invisible, in the body of this bill.

I make this confession with the less shame because I believe I am in this respect in like condition with every other member of the committee, with every other member of the Senate, and with everybody else in the country.

The fact that we have this bill under consideration assumes that it is the duty of Congress to know something of its contents and to have some understanding of its probable operation and effect. The committee has not sought or seemed to desire such knowledge. By a mere reference to the title it is proposed to enact the entire system of tariff duties imposed by the Philippine Commission upon goods imported into the Philippine Islands.

I have not studied that act of the Commission. Its details were never discussed in the committee. The only part of it that was ever read was the title of the act, which we have copied into this bill for the purpose of enacting it into a law. The committee simply said, in effect, "somewhere or other there is a list of duties fixed up by the Philippine Commission; wherever it is and whatever it is, be it the law." So far as any knowledge on the part of the committee is concerned, we might as well have enacted the contents of a sealed envelope without taking it out of the post-office.

If it be said, Mr. President, that the Philippine Commission have given thorough study and consideration to this question, then I ask whose business is it to make this law? If it is the duty of Congress, then I respectfully submit that duty is not faithfully performed simply by writing "be it enacted" on the wrapper of a roll of manuscript sent here from the Philippine Islands.

If it be said that it is impossible for Congress to deal understandingly with a question involving subjects and rates of taxation in the Philippines, then I say the sooner Congress washes its hands of a duty it is not competent to perform the better it will be for its own honor and for the welfare of the country.

We are simply now, in a roundabout way, delegating to five men in the Philippine Islands, 10,000 miles away, the legislative authority which belongs to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, there never were five men on earth who could arrange a tariff bill for this country that could run the gauntlet of a Congressional committee without being maimed and disfigured for life. This act of the Commission flits gayly through two committees of this Congress without losing a hair of its head. We never passed a tariff bill for this country without extended hearings, lasting for weeks and sometimes for months. We propose now to enact a tariff bill imposing taxes upon the products of 10,000,000 people without a hearing of a single hour, without the examination of a single witness, without the asking of a single question.

This is partly due, I confess, to an inability, inherent in the very nature of the case, to deal intelligently with the question. It is also due to the indifference with which taxes are imposed when the men who impose them do not pay the taxes and are not responsible to those who do.

But look at the contrast, sir, when the committee comes to deal with imports from the Philippines into the United States. This childlike trust and faith in the Commission vanishes at once. The committee understands that it has to deal with powerful interests in the United States, who can effectively protest against its action.

The bill as it came from the House imposed the full rates of the Dingley law. The Senate committee proposes to reduce it to 75 per cent. The Philippine Commission earnestly recommends that it be reduced to 50 per cent. It believes that such a reduction would have a beneficial effect upon the trade and industry of the Philippines and upon the disposition of the people. The committee receives that suggestion with utter contempt. What business is it of the Filipinos, these foreigners, what duties we levy upon their goods? Why should we care how it affects their trade and industry? What do we care if it serves to deepen their distrust of our benevolent intentions? We simply say to them, "Here is the law and here is the Army to back it up."

Mr. President, it can not be denied that chief among the "other purposes" mentioned in the title of this bill is the purpose of protection. When the Porto Rican tariff was under discussion, the President sent a message to Congress declaring that it was our "plain duty" to abolish all customs duties between this country and Porto Rico. A bill to that effect was prepared and presented to Congress, and was abandoned at the first yell of the lobby. When the substitute for that bill was presented, it was openly declared by its very authors that its main purpose was to establish a precedent for a protective and prohibitory tariff law against the products of the Philippine Islands. What a commentary this is on the loud boasting we have had of the immense profits to be made in the Philippine trade! We are fighting in the archipelago to-day with sword and bayonet for that trade, and here we are legislating in frantic terror because we are about to get what we want. You have filled us with visions and dreams of the vast resources of that Eldorado, only waiting for the developing touch of American enterprise, and now you tell us if we do develop the resources and industries of that country it will ruin our own!

Mr. President, this bill is framed upon the very theory that the Philippine Islands are a deadly menace to American trade and that the less we trade with that country and the less we develop it the better it will be for our own. The only trade that will grow under that policy will be the trade of the spoilsman. You are simply preparing to deliver that country over to a foul brood of syndicated carpetbaggers, who are even now stooping like vultures to their hideous feast. It is for their benefit, and not for the benefit of the American people, and still less for the benefit of the Filipinos, that you are waging this war of criminal aggression in the Philippine Islands.

Sir, I can not separate this bill, even in thought, from the policy of which it is a part. We are opposed to this bill because we are opposed to that policy. We do not intend to confine our attacks to one single act, to one single expression, to one single manifestation. It is against the whole policy of colonial empire that we make our protest.

Mr. President, like many others, I have for several years been engaged in frequent discussions on this question. I can not hope at this time to add much that is new to the debate, nor much, indeed, to what I myself have already said; but, sir, when passion has sway and when madness rules the hour, it is our duty to cry the truth aloud with unceasing iteration until returning reason shall give it audience. I believe, sir, that that hour of returning reason is fast coming, if it has not come. Deep down in the hearts of the American people there is an abiding sense of right and justice, an enduring faith in the principles of the Republic.

The fierce acclamations that hailed the beginning of this policy no more measure the great depths of the public thought than the height of the wave measures the depths of the sea. Now that the storm that swept us from our moorings has spent its worst fury, we begin to enter the clear calm of sober, dispassionate reason. Men who heretofore have simply shouted are beginning to think; and I believe there are Senators upon that side of the Chamber who wish in their hearts that the Republican party could find some way to undo what it has done without a confession of failure or mistake.

John Bright, the great English statesman, once said that the greatest danger to our institutions is surprise—the danger that some bold and brilliant leader will commit his party and the country to some new policy that has never been maturely considered and accepted. I ask, in all seriousness, if we are not to-day in the midst of the very danger against which we were so solemnly warned? Who does not believe that in the sudden adoption of this policy the whole country, and even the Republican party, were taken by surprise? Who can pretend that it was ever maturely considered and accepted? If at any time before the thunder of Dewey's guns in Manila Bay it had been proposed that this country enter upon a policy of foreign conquest; that it should become a ruler of tropical archipelagoes and the tyrant of distant provinces, the proposal would have shocked the national conscience and would have been overwhelmed in one universal voice of protest and condemnation. The very thought would have been impossible to any considerable number of the American people except when their blood was fevered with the passion of war. Mr. President, we shall not consent that the passion of a single hour shall fix the destinies of this Republic forever.

We are told that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided this question against us; but, Mr. President, the two founders of the two great political parties now existing in this country rejected with scorn the proposition that the decisions of that high tribunal should be binding upon their consciences as a rule of political action. We do not intend that they shall be binding upon ours. It is true, sir, that five members of that court wrangled and jangled their way to a decision against our view of the constitutional power of Congress. It is equally true that four members of the court, in strong and harmonious opinions, concurred in our view. We shall not agree that the four members of that court were necessarily wrong and that the five members were necessarily right simply because five is a greater number than four.

The minority of this committee hold and have expressed the view that it is, at last, the duty of Congress to restrain itself within the limitations of the Constitution and to firmly reject any judicial grant of arbitrary and unlimited power.

We are told, Mr. President, that the people of the country have finally decided this question against us. If it be true that the country has conclusively decided against the principles for which we contend, then it is a sadder day for the country than it is for the Democratic party. I have no desire that the Democratic party should live except to defend those great principles and serve those high purposes for which this Government was formed. If this Republic is to perish, God forbid that the Democratic party should survive.

When Samuel grieved because his people turned from a government established in divine wisdom and demanded that they should be ruled by a king like the heathen nations of the world, the Lord said unto Samuel, "They have not rejected thee; they have rejected Me." Mr. President, if the country has indeed rejected the principles for which we now contend, it has not rejected the Democratic party; it has rejected the Declaration of Independence; it has rejected the principles of the Constitution; it has rejected all those high conceptions of human government which have given life and power and purpose to this American Republic.

But, Mr. President, the people have not adjudged this question. Under our system of party government it is impossible to present any single naked issue to the people and to obtain a verdict upon that question alone. We know that this was not the only question presented to the people; that it was not even the dominant issue in that campaign.

We know that there are many men of the highest character, men of high power and influence in the Republican party, like the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], like the late Speaker of the House of Representatives, like ex-President Harrison, like ex-Secretary Sherman, ex-Senator Edmunds, and other men of great weight and power and influence, who were as bitterly opposed to this policy as we are, and yet who gave their earnest support to the Republican candidate in that campaign. We know that other men of great influence who have heretofore acted with the Democratic party—men like ex-President Cleveland and ex-Secretary Carlisle—who were in entire harmony with us upon this question, still refused to act with the Democratic party. We know that the same is true of a very large and powerful section of the press of the country. We know that the German press and the German voters, almost to a paper and almost to a man, were opposed to your policy upon this question, and yet almost to a newspaper and almost to a man they supported the Republican party.

Finally, Mr. President, we know that the one controlling fact, the one irresistible, immovable fact, against which we dashed ourselves in vain, was the fact that we had financial depression and industrial disaster under the Democratic Administration of Mr. Cleveland and prosperity and good times under the Administration of Mr. McKinley. I do not believe that the Democratic party was to blame for the one fact, and I do not believe that the Republican party was entitled to the credit for the other. But the arguments based on these facts were mighty, and they did prevail. The people, in fact, did vote for imperialism, but they only intended to vote for "the full dinner pail."

In addition to that, Mr. President, the war party, when it has control of the Government, has a great advantage over its adversaries. This is due not only to the fact that war calls to the surface the worst passions of mankind, but it is due also to the fact that at such a time the war party has almost complete control of the sources of knowledge by which public opinion is instructed and informed; and it is also almost impossible, sir, for any party or any administration to resist the temptation to use this power for its own benefit. We have had illustrations of this again and again in English history. It was illustrated at the time of the Afghan war in 1840—a war in which there was a great catastrophe to the English arms—a disaster that may be described in the simple statement that, out of a moving host of sixteen thousand who set out on their retreat from Cabul, only one man reached his destination to tell the story of massacre and of destruction. The English people were enraged. The dispatches laid before Parliament were mutilated by the Government and the people were made to believe that the war was due simply to the innate devilishness of the Afghan ruler and his people. Years afterwards, when the full dispatches were published and when all the facts were known, it was revealed that the Afghan ruler, from an attitude of entire friendliness, had been goaded to fury and desperation by the base and blundering perfidy of the British Government.

In 1857 a British fleet threw shot and shell into the city of Canton, China, for three weeks. Men like Gladstone and Disraeli and the present Marquis of Salisbury denounced the action of the Government in this matter. They were held up to execration for supporting an "insolent barbarian" who had "insulted the British flag" and defied the authority of the British Government. Upon that issue Lord Palmerston swept proudly back to power. But after the thing was all over the fact was shown to be that the only offense this Chinese governor had committed against the British Government was to arrest a number of Chinese criminals on Chinese vessels in Chinese waters.

The same story has been repeated in the South African war. Mr. President, we have had a like condition of affairs in the Philippines. At the very time when a new policy, an unheard-of policy, was being pressed upon the country, when it was of the most vital importance that the people should have full and accurate knowledge, not one scrap of information in regard to conditions and affairs in the Philippines could reach them until it had been first sifted through the fingers of a censor whose instruction, as he himself avowed, was to let nothing go that might hurt the Republican party. It was not in any sense a military censorship. It was a censorship established by and for and in the interest of the Republican party. The correspondents of the newspapers there—most of them representing Republican newspapers, newspapers entirely in sympathy with the Administration—united in the statement that not only were important matters of fact continually suppressed, but that absolute falsehoods were written by the censor into the body of their reports in order to deceive and mislead the American people.

There was no claim, sir, that those reports were untrue. There was no claim, as has been sometimes pretended in this country, that it would give information to the Filipinos. It was never pretended that it would affect the military situation in the Philippines. It was simply claimed that it would affect the political situation in the United States to the disadvantage of the party in power. They simply said, in substance, "We want the American people to give their support to this war and to this policy, but if we permit them to know the facts, if we allow the truth to be told, this policy will become odious and the American people will not approve it."

Mr. President, the principle upon which that censorship was conducted may be shown by a single instance. When the correspondents went to the censor with a simple matter-of-fact statement about the silver currency of that country, that high and mighty official at once drew forth his blue pencil and said: "No; I can not let that go; that would be a boost for Bryan, and my orders are to let nothing go that will hurt the Administration." It was not until after long argument and great difficulty that they were able to persuade him that this item had no relation whatever to the 16 to 1 proposition in the United States, and not until he was so convinced would he let it be transmitted.

Mr. President, the Republican party may rejoice in a sentiment thus created; they may rejoice in a sentiment created by the suppression of free speech, by the dissemination of falsehood, by editing of newspapers of the United States with a bayonet; but I tell you such is not the kind of sentiment by which final and irrevocable verdicts are rendered. We intend, if possible, that light shall be thrown upon every nook and corner of that Philippine situation, and then, sir, we shall appeal to the fuller knowledge and saner judgment of the American people.

I believe, Mr. President, that the time has come for a sober and unimpassioned review of recent events. We have but to retrace the successive steps that have brought us to this pass to see how far we have wandered from our own ideals as a nation. A cruel and inhuman war, against a people struggling for freedom, was being waged so close to our shores that the sea between us was tinged with red, and the blood of murdered liberty was spattered upon our garments.

To put an end to these horrors this nation rose in arms; but, when it did so, it called God and the nations to witness that it was fighting not for spoils, or empire, or dominion, but solely for the cause of liberty and humanity.

Sir, I had hoped that in the future time, when greed or ambition should ask with sneering lip, "What have you gained for all the blood and treasure you have sacrificed in your war with Spain?" we should simply point to the Philippine Islands and to the fair island of Cuba, no longer faint with famine and drenched with blood, no longer made desolate with fire and sword, but blossoming to the touch of peaceful industry, and vocal with the anthem of the free. I had hoped that we might point to such a scene and answer, "These are the fruits of our victory." "Liberty and humanity" is the noblest war cry of a Christian nation, and the "blessing of a people redeemed the richest spoil of a Christian soldier." But, Mr. President, it seems as if the dust of centuries had been heaped upon the beginning of that war, and we are now repeating in the Philippine Islands the very history of Spain in the island of Cuba, including the very concentration policy which roused the horror and indignation of the American people.

I will not stop to-day, Mr. President, to read extracts from official orders issued by our military officers in that country, but a condition of things is shown which, to my mind, is an absolute disgrace to any nation which even professes to wage a civilized warfare. We are going through the country with fire and sword, leaving a track of ruin and desolation behind us. The light of our civilization is seen in the glare of blazing villages. The land lies scorched and blasted, not by the hoof beat of some barbaric Hun, but by the benevolent breath of this free Republic.

When you hear of these horrors, when they reach the ears of our Republican friends, they raise their hands in holy indignation and say, "God help the poor colored man in the South." You are outraged and indignant when you hear of an occasional lynching of a negro criminal in the Southern States. But you are engaged in lynching 10,000,000 people, who were but lately your allies and your brothers in arms, and who have committed no crime but the crime upon which this Republic was founded.

Mr. President, one other word in this connection. One of the most lamentable results of our course in the Philippine Islands is that it has deadened our sympathy for the cause of freedom. We have wasted the moral power we might have employed to avert one of the most sorrowful tragedies ever written in the history of this world. To-day we sit dumb and cold and apathetic, watching the hideous butchery of a free republic—the destruction of a race that comes of the same high lineage and the same heroic ancestry as our own; a people who again and again have sealed with blood their devotion to the cause of liberty, who have resisted oppression with a fortitude unparalleled in the annals of mankind. Nay, more, this Government is in active sympathy with the butcher. The very head devil of that fiendish war in South Africa has dared to proclaim an alliance with the United States of America, and our ambassador at the Court of St. James echoes the proclamation.

Mr. President, the contrast between the opening and closing chapters of this war is revealed in the very taunt that is constantly flung into our teeth, that we forced the Administration into the war with Spain and are now fatuously opposing its efforts to "reap the fruits." It seems to be assumed now that from the very beginning we had no other thought than the spoils to be wrung from a conquered province. I should like to ask, Mr. President, why it is that our Republican friends are so eager to transfer to us the responsibility of the Spanish war? They seem to think that we must bear the shame of a war for liberty and humanity, but they claim as their very own a war for plunder and for spoils.

Mr. McKinley in his message reviewing that war said that the course of Spain in Cuba had left no honorable alternative except war; you want it understood that the Democratic party flogged you into a war in which there was nothing involved but the nation's honor, but that you entered with zest and eagerness into a war where honor was to be sacrificed for the sake of spoils. We are willing, sir, that the record shall so stand, but we deny that by consenting to the one war we become responsible for the other. The war for the liberation of Cuba has no more connection with the war for the subjugation of the Philippines than any other war for liberty has with any other war for plunder and for spoils.

Mr. President, the abrupt and violent departure which this policy makes from accepted and established faiths is illustrated by a speech made by a gentleman at a great imperialist mass meeting held two or three years ago in the city of Chicago. He quoted from the Declaration of Independence the sentiment that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and declared that it was the greatest lie ever invented by the devil to deceive a credulous world.

Mr. President, some of the founders of the Republican party were accustomed to denounce the Constitution as a league with death and a covenant with hell, because it recognized the institution of human slavery. The Republicanism of to-day denounces the immortal Declaration as the work of the devil, because it sounds a cry for human freedom. That is the difference between the Republican party of Abraham Lincoln and the Republican party of to-day.

Mr. President, I have heard time and again the very arguments used by Stephen A. Douglas in his debate with Abraham Lincoln spoken trippingly on the tongue of the very leaders of the Republican party; and more than that, I heard a distinguished Republican leader upon the floor of Congress repeat with substantial accuracy, with absolute identity of thought and argument, passages from the farewell speech of Jefferson Davis, and I heard it received with thunders of applause on the Republican side.

DEMOCRATIC VS. REPUBLICAN EXPANSION.

Mr. President, I know that the sanction of the Democratic party is sometimes claimed for this policy, and we are reminded that Democratic statesmanship has again and again enlarged the boundaries of the Republic. But I want to remind you that under Democratic statesmanship it was indeed the boundaries of the Republic that were enlarged. You do not enlarge the boundaries of the Republic by seizing a distant territory to be ruled forever as a vassal province outside of the Union and outside of the Constitution. You do not enlarge the boundaries of the Republic by adding territory that is to be no part of the Republic.

Mr. President, the Democratic party has never acquired one inch of territory that it did not sign a covenant that the inhabitants of that territory should be clothed with all the rights of American citizenship and that they should be protected by all the guaranties of the Constitution; that they should be organized into self-governing communities and finally admitted as States of the American Union. The Democratic party has acquired territory in order that it might add new States to the Union and new stars to the flag. But it is one thing, sir, to add a new star to the flag and another to put there a blot of human blood and call it a star.

Sir, upon every part of the map of the United States that marks an acquisition by the Democratic party you may write "statehood," "citizenship," and the "Constitution." Upon that which marks the acquisition of the Republican party you must write "conquered province," "vassal subjects," and "despotic power." Whatever our Republican friends may say, the two policies are not one and the same. The one is not a precedent for the other. The governments established throughout the territory of the Louisiana purchase are not identical in form or spirit with the government you have established in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, if this statement is not self-evident, then I ask leave to introduce and to bring to my assistance a very high and distinguished authority. The author of this book, in speaking of the ordinance of 1787, says:

> In one respect the ordinance marked a new departure of the most radical kind. The adoption of the policy therein outlined has worked a complete revolution in the way of looking at new communities formed by colonization from the parent country. Yet the very completeness of this revolution to a certain extent veils from us its importance. We can not realize the greatness of the change because of the fact that the change was so great, for we can not now put ourselves in the mental attitude which regarded the old course as natural.

He then proceeds to discuss the colonial systems of the different countries, and says:

> Each Roman colony that settled in Gaul or Iberia founded a city or established a province which was tributary to Rome, instead of standing on a footing of equality in the same nation with Rome.
> The modern European nations had followed the Roman system. Until the United States sprang into being every great colonizing people followed one system or the other.
> The American Republic, taking advantage of its fortunate federal features and of its strong central Government, boldly struck out on a new path, which secured the freedom-giving properties of the Greek method, while preserving national union as carefully as it was preserved by the Roman Empire. New States were created, which stood on exactly the same footing as the old; and yet these new States formed integral and inseparable parts of a great and rapidly growing nation. This movement was original with the American Republic. She was dealing with new conditions, and on this point the history of England merely taught her what to avoid.

He says the people of this added territory were "subject only to a government which they helped to administer on equal terms with the old States. No State was subject to another, new or old."

Mr. President, that is what was written in a book called "The Winning of the West," by the accomplished gentleman and scholar, the President of the United States.

I challenge any man to show where there is one particle of difference between Roman imperialism and the imperialism of the Republican party, Mr. Roosevelt himself being the judge. I challenge any man to show in what essential particular the Philippine Islands, in their relation to the Government at Washington, will differ from a province of the Roman Empire, Mr. Roosevelt being the judge.

Mr. President, when the President of the United States tells us, as he did in frequent speeches during the last campaign, that the two policies are practically identical, that the one is a precedent for the other, by the high authority of Mr. Roosevelt himself, I challenge the correctness of the statement. I appeal from the speech to the book. I appeal from the stump to the study, and I put the sedate historian against the fiery dragoon.

But now, Mr. President, there are men who say we are disloyal when we repeat the very sentiments of the most honored leaders of the Republican party. We have found no harsher term for this policy than to call it "criminal aggression," as it was called by President McKinley. We can find no more compendious description of its revolutionary and un-American character than to say that it is Roman imperialism, as President Roosevelt has said. We say it is a dangerous departure and an untried experiment. That is what was said by Judge Davis, the president of the commission who negotiated this treaty of annexation.

We say that it involves a violent shock to our national habits and traditions of thought, and even to the Constitution itself, and that was said by President Schurman, the first president of the Philippine Commission. We say we have enough difficult problems of our own at home without seeking more difficult ones abroad, and that was said by Judge Taft, president of the second Philippine Commission. We have not uttered one word in condemnation of this policy that has not been uttered by the very authors of the policy we condemn, and by no man, I beg leave to say, in stronger and more comprehensive terms than by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], whose views upon the subject I beg leave to present to the Senate. This is taken from an interview in the Chicago Times-Herald of May, 1898. The Senator, I see, is present, and I should like to know of him if he is incorrectly reported:

> If we should keep the Philippine Islands we should reverse the traditions of this Government from its foundation. We should open up a new line of policy. It would mean the establishment of a military government over possibly 10,000,000 people 6,000 miles away from us. It would mean the increase of our Navy to the proportions of the navies of Europe. It would mean the increase of our Army to 150,000, more likely to 200,000, men. It would mean the increase of our annual expenditures to double what they are now.

I just pause to remark that the Senator from New York is not only a wit but a prophet. He told of how this increase of taxes would be felt in the homes of the country, and said that the Federal tax collector would become a familiar official to the American people. One result of this policy, he declared, would be a "centralization of power far beyond what the old Federalists ever dreamed of." And then he said:

> You can not have empire without all its attributes, and that means a practical revolution of our form of government and an abandonment of the belief which the fathers held when they established this Government in 1776.

Mr. President, you may search all the literature of the opposition to this policy and you will find no words of stronger condemnation than have been uttered by the distinguished Senator from New York and by the very leaders and by the very founders of this policy. So it is not a difference of opinion between us as to the meaning and character of this policy. It is only a difference as to whether or not we shall enter upon a policy which we both admit to be revolutionary and un-American in its character.

A QUESTION OF HONOR.

But, Mr. President, not only must we turn our backs upon the traditions and principles of the past, but we must be guilty of an act of perfidy that will put the brand of shame upon the nation's honor. I say, sir, that we have no right to forget that the Filipinos were but recently our allies and our comrades in war. Long before we were hunting Aguinaldo in the swamps of the Philippine Islands, long before the President of the United States was denouncing him and his associates as bloodthirsty Apaches, we were hunting him for another and very different purpose.

I want to say right here, that if the President of the United States is correct, if he has properly characterized Aguinaldo as a bloodthirsty Apache, and his associates as the same, I do not know how Admiral Dewey and those who secured Aguinaldo's help and assistance can escape the charge of having violated, and deliberately violated, the rules of civilized warfare. If they sought out this fiendish savage and sent him to the Philippine Islands to organize his Apaches and lead them against our enemies, then, sir, they were guilty of a most flagrant violation of the laws of civilized warfare, and I hope that sometime or other a committee of the Senate will investigate this charge laid at Admiral Dewey's door by the President of the United States and find that he is not guilty.

Mr. President, it is not true. The fact remains that through our consul-general at Singapore, Mr. Pratt, we eagerly sought the assistance of Aguinaldo, and from the very beginning we knew that he and his people were fighting, not for a change of masters, but for absolute freedom. I say that their desire and purpose was revealed in the very first conference between Aguinaldo and the consul-general. Mr. Pratt permitted himself to be publicly and formally thanked by a deputation of Filipinos for having brought about an arrangement by which their people were to secure independence. He did not deny, but acquiesced in the statement; and all that was officially transmitted to the Government at Washington. It is true that Mr. Pratt was rebuked, but Aguinaldo was never undeceived. He was carried on an American vessel to the Philippine Islands. There he issued a proclamation calling his people to arms. In that proclamation he openly and boldly declared that the Americans believed they were fit for self-government and were there to help them to achieve their independence. And that proclamation was translated into English and officially transmitted to the Government at Washington.

The Filipinos organized a civil government of their own and openly proclaimed their character as an independent nation. All that was transmitted to the Government at Washington with the statement of Admiral Dewey that these people expected independence. General Anderson himself acknowledges that he said to Aguinaldo, when the latter became a little distrustful of our purposes, that he need not fear, that the United States never yet had established colonies, and he could trust in the honor of the American people. Fighting thus as our allies and fighting, as we knew, for independence, they drove the Spaniards from every foot of territory in the island except the city of Manila. By their own arms, by their own valor, and their own blood they had taken possession of their own country. I say that these facts constitute a binding obligation upon the United States to give these people their independence. It is trifling with the question to say that we made no formal written treaty. A great nation like the United States can not afford to plead the statute of frauds against an obligation of honor.

They tell us that we want to give away land. A newspaper in my State not long ago attacked me because it said I wanted to give away land which we had bought and paid for. Land! Nothing but land! No people living on it?

Mr. President, I do not question that our claim of sovereignty over the Philippines is indefeasible as against any other power, but I say that is not a question of international law. It is a question of the national honor. Spain had forfeited to the Filipinos all moral claim of sovereignty and dominion. She had nothing but a rotten title and a barren scepter. We bought from her a country she no longer possessed and a people she had ceased to rule. We bargained for a bloody lawsuit against freedom—a right to step into her bloody shoes and to pursue her bloody career.

These considerations can not be answered by appeals to spurious patriotism or by shouting "Who will pull down the flag?" Sir, for the honor of the flag I would pull it down wherever it waves as an emblem of force and despotism. I would not leave it to droop above crouching serfs and crawling slaves, 7,000 miles from its home of freedom; and I would not leave it for one single hour to flaunt its protecting folds over the harem and the slave pen of that foul, polygamous beast, the Sultan of Sulu. I would bring it home to its own country and let it wave over its own people.

THE FIG LEAVES OF CRIMINAL AGGRESSION.

Mr. President, I wish to deal, before proceeding to another branch of the question, with certain pretenses or excuses or apologies. It is claimed, sir, that we are not forcing a government upon the people of the Philippines without their consent; that an overwhelming majority of the people are really in favor of American rule. I have no doubt that for a time there were people who honestly believed it. Mr. McKinley himself did. He was deceived into believing that the friends of American rule in the Philippines outnumbered its enemies in the proportion of a thousand to one. I do not suppose there is one man now in the United States of tolerably good sense and with a modicum of information who believes that there are any people in the Philippine Islands who are in favor of our policy.

General MacArthur went to the Philippines himself believing that the opposition was confined to a few turbulent chiefs and their disorderly followers. He now admits that he has been undeceived. From contact with the people all over the island he tells us, substantially, we have no friends among the Filipinos; that they are all in favor of liberty and independence. General Chaffee tells us the same. He says all the Filipinos there are traitors to American sovereignty. Burke did not know how to draw an indictment of treason against a whole people. It takes a military gentleman to do that. They are all opposed to our sovereignty. They are all opposed to American rule. That is what all our military officers tell us.

FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

Mr. President, the fact that there is no considerable body of sentiment in the Philippine Islands in favor of our policy is demonstrated by the fact that it has been openly and utterly condemned by the very natives who are our most trusted friends and counsellors, by the very natives holding office under our appointment, by the three native members of the Philippine Commission themselves. Governor Taft tells us, and it is stated in the report of the Philippine Commission, that these men have organized what they call the Federal party over there, and a history of the Federal party is given in the report of the Philippine Commission. I want to read one little statement. This is signed by the three native members of the Philippine Commission, men who have been our friends and our supporters against Aguinaldo and his associates. In speaking of the condition of public sentiment there they say:

> In view of the greatly disturbed condition of the country after the 4th day of February, 1899, it was not easy to foresee when a political party could be formed, and it appeared impossible to arrange a peace proposition which would induce the Filipinos to acknowledge American sovereignty. A policy of government based principally upon the most absurd intolerance which had obtained in the Philippines for more than three centuries until the arrival of the Americans, has established in the minds of the Filipinos the deep-rooted conviction that an alien sovereignty could come with no other object in view than an iniquitous exploitation and that it could be maintained by no other means than a selfish and absorbing government founded upon civil intolerance, religious mediævalism, and inexorable military power—the triple alliance which the previous government relied on.
> The successes of the Union Army in the war convinced the Filipinos that there was a superior force which would annihilate them; but these successes could not prevent the people—
> The people!—
> bleeding and without strength—from tenaciously continuing a suicidal struggle to escape the new slavery which they so greatly feared, even though it were at the cost of death.

There is the statement signed by the three members of the Philippine Commission, in which they say that the whole people of the Philippine Islands were permeated with a deep distrust of the American Government and a deep and invincible hostility to our sovereignty, so strong, indeed, that after their forces had been scattered, after all hope of victory had disappeared, they were willing to continue a hopeless struggle and preferred death itself to American rule. Such is the statement of three members of the Philippine Commission, the chosen associates of the gentlemen we have sent there from this country.

Now, sir, that was the condition of public sentiment which they undertook to combat by the organization of the Federal party. Governor Taft says and this report says that the Federal party has accomplished a great work in the pacification of the people and in reconciling them to American rule; that it has induced a large number of the insurgents to lay down their arms. By what means was it done? Did they picture to them the beneficence of colonial government and the blessings of proconsular rule? Did they tell them that the best thing that could happen to them would be to exist as a mere dependency of the United States, outside of the Union and outside of the Constitution?

Whatever success has been achieved by these members of the Commission and by the Federal party has been by holding out to the people there a false and fraudulent promise and a delusive hope. In the platform of that party, prepared by these three gentlemen on the Commission, they declare that the Philippine Archipelago is to be made an integral part of the United States; that it is to be organized in the form of a Territory, like New Mexico or Arizona; that the people are to be admitted to full rights of American citizenship, and finally admitted to statehood in the American Union. No man in the Philippine Islands dares to appeal to public sentiment in the name of a colonial policy.

Mr. President, I do not know whether these three native members of the Commission who promulgated this platform are deliberately practicing a fraud upon their people or whether they are themselves deceived; but, sir, I say if the people there are being induced to act with us under this pitiful delusion, I do not see how it can be justified from the standpoint of common honesty or common honor.

By making these false pretenses, by holding out to the people these false and delusive hopes, you are but sowing the seeds of future insurrections and planting in the people an undying hatred for the American people and the American Government. What will become of your Federal party that is doing this thing; what will become of that party when it is known that the United States have no idea of granting one single thing they demand? Sir, it is better to tell them the coarse and brutal truth at once, instead of suffering them to hug a pitiful delusion that must soon be stricken to the ground as brutally and contemptuously as were their early hopes of independence. We have no right to practice such a fraud on the Philippine Islanders in order to get their consent to American rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us the date of that document?

Mr. CARMACK. It is in the last report.

Mr. TILLMAN. The one just printed?

Mr. CARMACK. Yes; in the appendix—Appendix A, History of the Federal party.

I shall not stop to argue the question as to whether the Filipinos are capable of self-government. I think that has been thoroughly demonstrated, and especially by the fact that they had established a civil government under which law and order were maintained and life and property were protected and peaceful industry was pursued until we went there and overturned it. That is the testimony of Mr. Barrett, and it is the testimony of Consul-General Wildman and other distinguished supporters of this policy.

THE MISSIONARY PRETEXT.

There is one other little pretense to which I wish to refer. It is one that is intended to appeal to the religious people of the country, and that is that we are going there for missionary purposes. We are killing these people over there for the salvation of their souls. We are extending our Christian civilization in the Philippines over the dead bodies of the Filipinos. We are building up the Church of God out of human bones, cemented together with human blood. It is a pious, a holy, a religious war. Our very guns are supposed to be wadded with texts of Scripture; our rifle bullets sing psalms as they whistle through the air; our cannon balls are missionaries, bearing glad tidings of peace on earth and good will toward men.

Mr. President, of whom was it the old prophet spoke when he said, "They build up Zion with blood and Jerusalem with iniquity?" I believe he was talking about the Republican party. I can not keep from believing it. When David in his old age bethought him to build a temple to the Most High, a voice from heaven sounded in his ear and said to him that he had been a man of war and had shed much blood, and that he was not fit to build a temple to the Lord. Then it said to him but one should come after him, whose reign should be a reign of peace, and that into his hand should be committed the building of the Lord's temple.

Mr. President, if the Church of God is to be established in the Philippine Islands it will not be by an Administration whose hands are red with the innocent blood. It will be by some Administration that is to come after, bearing in its hands the gift of liberty and the blessings of peace.

TRADE AND COLONIES.

Sir, these are mere pretexts; they are the mere fig leaves of imperialism and of criminal aggression.

Sometimes the arguments of our friends are garnished with these pretexts of humanity, but wherever you hear it the staple of the argument—in the press, on the hustings, or on the floors of Congress—is simply the greed for gain and the lust for power.

We are told that we must have colonial possessions in order to extend our foreign trade. Mr. President, the Democratic party has always been in sympathy with the true commercial spirit. We want to see our products sold in every market and our flag floating on every sea. But we have no sympathy with that spurious commercialism in whose dictionary "buying" and "selling" are synonymous with killing and stealing. We do not believe that trade means plunder or that commerce means war. On the contrary, we believe that commerce will move with a swifter and a surer foot in the ways of peace than in paths made slippery with human blood.

Mr. President, the commercial statistics of our own country supply ample refutation of the doctrine that we can only extend our trade by shooting our customers and capture a market by bombarding a city.

One of the new truths which this nation has taught to mankind is the truth that world-wide commerce may go hand in hand with Christian mercy and the principles of a free republic. I challenge any man to compare the wealth and power, the trade and industry, of the United States with the greatest colonial power of the world. Our wealth and trade have not been increased by distant possessions; yet our exports are greater than those of any European nation, while our internal commerce surpasses anything of which they have ever dreamed. European nations which for centuries have ridden with bloody hoof over prostrate nations and marked their every advance by the slaughter of their brother man, to-day stand aghast at the conquering strides of American commerce in all the markets of the world.

And for all this marvelous commercial growth no struggling republics have been foully murdered, no nations have been shorn of their liberty, no widows have mourned, no orphans wept, no blood cried out against us from the ground.

Gentlemen tell us that we must have colonies in order to have trade. I answer, without colonies we have become the greatest industrial and commercial nation of the world.

Mr. President, it is easy to put this matter to a plain test. Which of the nations are to-day achieving the greatest success in the extension of their foreign markets? Is it the colonial or the noncolonial nations? England is the greatest colonial nation of the world; France comes next in the extent and importance of its colonies; Germany's colonies are of little or no commercial importance, and the United States have had no colonies. Here upon the one hand are two great colonial powers; on the other hand two great noncolonial powers. Now, sir, the fact is notorious, it is proclaimed in every English and every French newspaper every day, that these two great noncolonial powers, the United States and Germany, are rapidly passing the great colonial nations of the world and will soon have all to themselves the struggle for the commercial primacy of the world.

Why, sir, I read a year or so ago some tables and comments from the Bureau of Statistics published in the Review of the World's Commerce. In there was included a statement or a report from Mr. Chamberlain, British Secretary of State for the colonies. His report was based upon letters or reports received from the governors of the English colonies throughout the world in reply to inquiries as to the state of English trade in the British possessions. Every one of them, without a solitary exception, showed that during the whole period under inquiry there had been a steady decline in the imports of English goods into the British possessions, and that they had been displaced by goods from the United States and Germany, the two great noncolonial powers of the world.

England's trade is declining with all her possessions. It is and for years has been declining with India, with Egypt, with Australia and New Zealand, with Canada, and with every one of her possessions throughout the whole world. Some people think that England would have no trade but for her colonies, yet I have seen a statement in an English magazine that England sells more of her manufactured goods to Germany and France, where her flag is never seen, where she is utterly loathed and detested, than to all her colonies and possessions combined.

It is said that trade follows the flag. Why, sir, we sell $2 worth of goods in Canada, right under the shadow of the English flag, where England herself sells one, and it is even said that we manufacture the very bunting from which the flag itself is made.

Mr. President, the nation that can sell the best goods at the best price will get the trade, no matter under whose flag the goods were made.

THE PHILIPPINE TRADE.

And what is this marvelous trade we are going to have with the Philippine Islands? You would think the Filipino was the greatest buyer in the world, to hear these people talk.

Mr. President, it is a little difficult to arrive at just what is the conception that our imperialist friends have of the Filipino. When they talk about him from the standpoint of government they want you to think of him as a stark-naked barbarian, who has not even reached the breech-clout stage of civilization. When they talk of him from the standpoint of trade they want you to think of him as flooding the American market with his orders for dress goods, boots and shoes, bicycles, steam plows, and pianos. One moment he is a nude barbarian, clothed only in feathers, red paint, and hot weather. The next moment he is keeping all the mills and factories of the world working double time to supply the demands of his refined and luxurious taste. He seems to have been specially constructed to fit any kind of argument you want to make about him. I have sometimes imagined, Mr. President, that a composite picture of the Filipino in accordance with these various conflicting views would represent him sitting by a camp fire, reading the scholarly speeches of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] while waiting for the missionary to boil. [Laughter.]

The greatest buyer in the world! Why, Mr. President, if we can make a profit of 10 per cent on all the goods we sell to the Philippine Islands we will about get back in a thousand years what we have already expended. If we could increase our present trade a thousand per cent and make a profit of 10 per cent on every export and every import it would just about defray the cost of maintaining there three regiments of American soldiers. Some of our military officers say we must keep there for an indefinite period an army of 50,000 men. Such an army kept there for a single twelve months would consume the profit on our present trade for one hundred and fifty years. That is the size of the imperial bonanza we have found in those distant seas.

Mr. President, my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] in describing the glories that rushed upon his vision in that wonderful archipelago described it as teeming with natural wealth, only waiting for development, that surpassed the dreams of avarice. I am not giving his exact language, understand, but that is the substance. Then suddenly bethinking him that he might alarm the protected interests with a suggestion of Philippine competition, he hastened to tell them to be of good cheer, because the Filipinos were too lazy to develop anything. So, sir, we are going to get an immense trade through the purchases of people who are too poor to buy, and build up immense industries by the labor of people who are too lazy to work. Sic transit gloria of the Philippine Islands!

"A GATEWAY TO CHINA."

But we are told that we do not want the Philippine Islands simply for themselves; that they are to give us a gateway into the immense Chinese trade—to be for us what Hongkong is for Great Britain. Well, Mr. President, I will just pause to remark that if we could sell to the 400,000,000 people in China one-half of all the goods they buy from all the world it would not be much greater than what we are now selling to 5,000,000 people in Canada.

But still it is a trade worth having, and it is a trade that may grow. But is it necessary for us to get us a Hongkong simply because Great Britain has one? What is Hongkong doing for Great Britain in her Chinese trade? Mr. President, I have followed the statistics of Great Britain's trade with Hongkong and China through the volumes of the Statesman's Year Book for a period of about fifteen years, and I find that during that time her exports to Hongkong have declined 50 per cent and her imports from Hongkong have declined 40 per cent. Her trade with both China and Hongkong has been declining all the time.

On the other hand, the United States, beginning from a time when we had never dreamed of taking the Philippine Islands, has been steadily and constantly increasing its trade with China. We doubled our exports to that country from 1893 to 1896 and doubled them again in the next three years. The same is true of our trade with Japan, with British Australasia, and with Asiatic Russia.

Now, sir, in view of these facts, in view of the unexampled success we have achieved in conquering the oriental market, where does the necessity appear for us to venture on this dangerous and untried experiment upon the mere hope that we may do better what we are already doing so well? I beg leave to commend to the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, and especially to the two Senators from Ohio, the pregnant and effective motto, "Let well enough alone."

KEEP AMERICAN CAPITAL AT HOME.

Mr. President, I can not understand this eagerness to seek new and distant fields of adventure for American capital and enterprise. We have yet a new, undeveloped country, with only 25 people to the square mile, against 250 in Germany, 370 in England, and 570 in Belgium. We are compelled to draw upon the capital of the whole world in order to develop our own resources. Every dollar of available capital in the United States, and many hundred millions besides, could find safe and profitable investment here in our own country. Every such dollar, sir, would go to the purchase of American material, would go to the payment of American labor, would go to bring peace and happiness and comfort to American homes. Instead of wishing to send American capital across the seas and to the other side of the world, I would concentrate all the power and all the energies of the American people to the task of developing the United States of America. When you have done that, sir, you will not have a man or a dollar to spare for the Orient or for the Tropics.

And, Mr. President, there are two sides to this question of the development of the Orient. We have been told of the vast mineral and other resources of China, of its vast quantities of coal and iron ore, of its great abundance of the cheapest and most effective labor in the world. Where will be the profit to the American people when these products shall be poured out into the markets of the world in competition with the products of American labor? Mr. President, if American capitalists wish to consummate their union with Chinese labor on Chinese soil, we have no right to forbid them, but I protest against this Government being a party to the transaction. I protest against taxing the American people for the destruction of American industry. I protest against making American labor pay the cost of its own degradation.

MUST STOP NOW!

Mr. President, I beg leave to say to gentlemen who are giving a constrained and doubtful consent to this policy that if you are going to stop it you must stop now. The hunger for empire when once it seizes upon the mind and imagination of a people becomes a passion as blind as the appetite of a drunkard or the greed of a miser. English statesmanship to-day is burdened and enslaved by it. Captain Mahan says that "England is gorged with land. Her statesmen are weary of looking after it and of the insistence with which one advance compels another." Gorged with land! Glutted with empire! Swollen to bursting with an undigested mass of colonial possessions, yet still crying aloud with the voice of the horse leech's daughter and reaching out with bloody and rapacious hands for more!

Mr. President, some of the champions of this policy proclaim that the seizure of the Philippine Islands is but the beginning of a permanent policy of conquest and subjugation throughout the world. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], in a brilliant speech which he made upon this question, said:

As self-government and internal development have been the dominant notes of our first century, administration and the development of other lands must be the dominant notes of our second century.

A distinguished member of the House of Representatives from New Hampshire declared that—

The United States must acquire new territory providing new markets over which she must maintain control. The Anglo-Saxon advances into the new regions with a Bible in one hand and a shotgun in the other. The inhabitants of those regions whom he can not convert with the Bible and bring into his markets, he gets rid of with the shotgun.

It is not enough that they be converted. If they want to be saved from the shotgun they must come into the market. To the mind, sir, of this gentle Puritan, the Bible, like the shotgun, is simply an instrument for opening markets. In the hands of the imperialist statesman the word of God itself is prostituted to the base uses of a skeleton key or a burglar's jimmy.

The Philippine Islands are to be simply a convenient point from which we may plunge into the thick of the European struggle for world-wide empire and dominion. Instead of preserving a vast but compact and continuous territory, inhabited by people of our own race and blood, instead of engaging in prosperous commerce with all nations, but sitting serenely apart from all their rivalries and contentions, we are to scatter our broken frontiers all over the globe; we are to push ourselves into the midst of all the plottings, bickerings, strifes, and jealousies that make up the sum total of European politics. From the moment we do so, sir, we shall never see one hour of peace. That which we shall call peace will simply be a state of armed and distrustful neutrality in which a nation sleeps uneasily upon its arms.

Sir, this country has long been the admiration of mankind because of its singular exemption from the burden of the great military establishments which are sapping the resources of every European government and crushing out the life, the spirit, and the hope of its people. All Europe is fainting beneath the weight of its armor. Its people are groaning and staggering beneath the burden of military taxes. There is not a crowned head nor a responsible minister in all Europe who can sleep one night in peace. There is no peace even when there is no war.

Mr. President, the happiest of all conditions for men and nations is that in which days of peaceful industry are followed by nights of untroubled repose. That is the condition, sir, which nature has conferred upon this great country, and it is a blessing we are asked to cast away for a mere phantom of greatness, a mere dream of power.

THE BURDENS OF MILITARISM.

Mr. President, when we enter upon this policy we must be prepared for war, for instant war, for war at any unexpected moment, and for war against the combined powers of all Europe. Let no man be deceived with the siren song of an Anglo-Saxon alliance. When this great and mighty nation enters the arena of the European struggle for empire it may easily happen that they will all lay aside their own jealousies and contentions in order to check the career of this imperious intruder. It is at least a condition for which we must be prepared.

Mr. President, we are now upon the flood tide of prosperity. Our revenues are abundant, our people are prosperous and uncomplaining. But that flood tide, sir, will ebb. The day of adversity will come. Your revenues will dwindle. Your people will begin to feel the pinch of taxation, and the cry will go up for retrenchment and reform. When that necessity is upon you, where will you begin to retrench? In the presence of the dangers you have created, and from which you can not escape, you dare not reduce your estimates for battle ships, you dare not cut down your Army appropriations. On the other hand, every rumor of war and every new complication abroad will call for increased military preparations and for new military taxes. You will have to curtail your expenditures for the peaceful purposes of government. You must cut down your appropriations for rivers and harbors and for other internal improvements to increase the prosperity and trade and commerce of the American people. All this you must do that your Government may bluster about the earth and swagger about the seas, disturbing the peace of the world and the peace of its own people.

Mr. President, they say that we have become a world power; they say that a great struggle is impending for the division of China, and that, having suddenly become a world power, it is incumbent upon us to take our part in the bloody game. I do not know whether such a crisis for the nations is soon to come. I trust the world may long be spared the horrors of such a conflict; but, sir, if it must come, from the most sordid commercial point of view, I hope that this nation may be at peace while the rest of the world is at war. While they are absorbing all their energies in the conflict, while they are crushing out their industries under the burden of military taxation, while they are ravaging each other's territory and destroying each other's merchant ships upon the sea, we have but to stretch forth our arm to grasp the carrying trade and the commerce of the world.

Sir, I confess I do not understand what gentlemen mean by the use of the term "world power" in this connection. I can not believe that this country has suddenly become a world power, simply by smiting to the earth a feeble and decrepit nation or by chasing the miserable natives through the swamps of the Philippine Archipelago. There has never been an hour in fifty years when we could not have done the same. If we had had no war with Spain, we should still have been the greatest nation of the world—the greatest in power, the greatest in prestige, the greatest in commerce and industry, and incomparably the greatest in its influence upon the thoughts, the feelings, and the aspirations of mankind.

For one hundred and twenty-five years this nation, uncorrupted by the lust for empire or dominion, free from the burden of great military establishments, has kept the even tenor of its way until it stands to-day without a rival among the nations of the earth. Such a nation, sir, does not need to proclaim its greatness by the shouting of its captains and the thunder of its guns. It does not need to scrawl its name across the page of history in the red blood of mankind.

Mr. President, we have reached a crisis in the nation's history. Shall we quit the path that has led us to greatness, to honor and renown? Shall we teach the people that this Republic was founded upon a lie? Sir, it is a perilous thing to shake the foundations of a nation's faith. A great English writer, Mr. Lecky, has said:

The appetite for organic change is one of the worst diseases that can affect a nation. All real progress grows out of stable and persistent national character, deeply influenced by custom, precedent, and old traditional reverence.

Mr. President, it is this "stable and persistent national character" which, like the mountain oak, strikes its roots into the rocks among which it germinated and leaped to life; it is this alone that can perpetuate the life of a free republic. It is this faith in the wisdom of established principles that constitutes the great anchor of popular government.

Let me warn you who sneer at the doctrines and the sentiments we have been taught to revere that the time will come, in some hour of madness and of passion, when you yourselves will appeal to the stirrer of the storm in the name of the old principles and the ancient faiths, and he will answer you out of the whirlwind with your own sneer. He will tell you that you yourselves have taught him to despise all the faiths and traditions of the past and to trust only in the opinions, the sentiments, and the passions of the hour.

Once unchain the spirit of revolution, and do not suppose that you can circumscribe or direct its work of destruction; do not suppose that it will spare for your sake some nook or corner of the Constitution where you may find shelter and protection. Say not to yourselves, "When the overwhelming scourge shall pass through, it will not come nigh unto us."

If we would perpetuate this Republic, we must perpetuate those high purposes that gave it life and are the very breath of its nostrils. If we would resist the forces of disorder, we must preserve intact and unbroken the walls which our fathers reared and stand fast by the citadel of the Constitution as by the Ark of the Covenant of the living God. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I shall require the attention of the Senate for but a moment in answer to one or two points in the very moderate and conservative speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], which points perhaps ought to be answered on the instant.

An impression was given, or a statement even made at the beginning of the speech, that the Philippine Committee had not considered the important question of the tariff scale which was adopted by the Philippine Commission. The impression was designed to be given to the country that we were legislating in ignorance and without consideration. That impression, Mr. President, must be corrected.

The tariff rates existing in the Philippines by the authority of the Philippine Commission were fixed by that Commission after consultation with every interest affected in the islands. They were fixed after considering the statements of importers and exporters, after consulting the producers, after talking with the natives. For two long years as studious a body of men as ever drafted a law labored patiently, industriously, and judicially upon this scale of tariff rates, which the Senator from Tennessee would have the Senate and the country understand has been enacted or recommended by this Commission ignorantly and without consideration.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I did not say anything of the kind, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I remember the Senator's statement that the committee might as well have passed upon the contents of a sealed envelope.

Mr. CARMACK. I did say that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly you did; and the rest of my statements are true as to the tariff rates which were approved by the report which the majority of the committee made.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Did his committee make any investigation into those questions?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, sir; but the Philippine Commission made an investigation covering two years.

Mr. CARMACK. I did not say the Commission had not investigated, nor did I refer to any neglect of duty on the part of the Commission.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the inference which was designed to be given to the country—otherwise the Senator's statement had no meaning whatever—was that we were acting in inconsiderate haste and without knowledge.

Mr. CARMACK. We were; yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let me say that that is the statement I rose to correct, so that the Senate and the country might understand that this committee, in recommending the approval of the tariff rates fixed by the Philippine Commission, had adopted rates which were themselves adopted by five as considerate and careful men as ever lived, conscientiously executing their duty for two long years, considering the statements of exporters and importers, considering the statements of producers, considering the statements of every interest on the islands that was affected by the rates.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that, although the Philippine Commission deliberated for a number of months upon this tariff, it evidently saw that it had been improperly imposed, because, with reference to goods coming into this country from the Philippine Islands, they recommended a reduction of 50 per cent, which the committee that had not considered the question at all declined to follow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator confuses two utterly and entirely different things—one the tariff rates of imports fixed by the Philippine Commission, which the Senator from Tennessee assailed, and the other the rates of duties on goods coming into this country. If the Senator will bring to bear upon this question his accustomed legal acumen and his great power of analysis, instead of using suppositions, which are taken as a platform for gentlemen upon the other side, he will understand the question better.

The Senator has made the point that the Philippine Commission recommended a reduction of rates here. What I am now talking about is the tariff rates that were fixed in the Philippine Islands by the Philippine Commission, which the Senator from Tennessee, if he meant his words to have any meaning at all, intended the country to understand were executed ignorantly and arbitrarily and without consideration. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the framing of these rates patience waited on investigation, and careful solicitude for our wards attended both.

If a certain tariff bill for this country which was framed some years ago—and which I doubt not met the approval of the Senator from Tennessee, as it met the approval of the Senators upon that side of the Chamber—had been written and prepared with the same careful consideration, patience, and consultation of this Commission's tariff rates, this country's prosperity would not have withered as it did, until starvation and bankruptcy took the place of the prosperity which had prevailed before and has prevailed since.

Mr. President, that brings me to a thought I had not intended to mention in the very brief remarks which I am now making, and that is that the Senator thought this Philippine question had not been settled. It is true it had been debated in this Senate Chamber four times and four times settled; it is true it had been twice debated before the great jury of the American people, and with the same verdict and the same result; only the second time more overwhelmingly than the first.

The Senator thinks he did not have a fair chance, or he thinks his party was not fairly represented before the country on the issues then presented. The issues were of their own choosing, Mr. President.

While I am talking upon that matter I want to say that the most remarkable piece of logic it has ever been my lot to hear was perpetrated by the Senator from Tennessee in explaining here why his party in the last campaign did not have the support of that great man who was formerly President of the United States—Grover Cleveland. He said the issue was with him and men like him, not imperialism, but that it was the fact that under his Administration there had been ruin and poverty, and under the succeeding one there had been prosperity, and, therefore, Mr. Cleveland would not stand with his own party again. If that is not an example of non sequitur, I have never listened to one.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator kindly repeat his last statement?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The last statement was that it was the most remarkable piece of non sequitur to which I ever had the pleasure of listening.

Mr. CARMACK. I heard the non sequitur; but what I want to know is to what does the non sequitur refer?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The statement to which the non sequitur refers is a presentation by the Senator from Tennessee boiled down, which he took a very great deal of time very eloquently to explain here, why his party did not have the support of Mr. Cleveland and other men like him. I remember his words well. They were, Mr. President, that the Philippine issue was not fairly presented, because, he said, we might as well admit it—and I was glad to hear it admitted—because there had been ruin and commercial disaster under the former Administration, a Democratic Administration, but there had been great prosperity under the succeeding one, a Republican Administration.

That was the only substantial statement with which he connected Mr. Cleveland's name, or Mr. Harrison's name, or any of the rest of the names of those eminent gentlemen who saw fit to join with the Republican party in the last campaign. Therefore, I have the right to say that that was the reason the Senator gave why Mr. Cleveland deserted the platform which the acts of his Administration had builded. If I am not right, I shall be very glad indeed to have the Senator from Tennessee make his statement clear right now.

Mr. CARMACK. I will ask if the argument the Senator is now making is that Latin thing which he was talking about a while ago?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is referring to the non sequitur, Mr. President.

Mr. CARMACK. I think that is it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I assure you if I am following the Senator in adopting a non sequitur it is the only thing in which I shall attempt to imitate him.

Mr. President, upon that point, since the Senator has seen fit to go into the question before the country as to why twice the party to which he belongs has not succeeded, perhaps it might not be improper to give the real reason why President Cleveland does not stand by that organization to-day, to give the real reason why ex-Senator Edmunds does not stand with it, why ex-President Harrison did not stand with it, and why all those other great men did not join it, although they did not approve of our colonial policy.

It was not the "full dinner pail" that affected ex-Senator Edmunds or President Cleveland or President Harrison; nor, Mr. President, am I left to infer what their reason was, because they have all stated it, especially Mr. Cleveland. It was the enunciation of the principle by his party formally, that the Senator has repeated upon the floor of the Senate this afternoon, the principle of political and social and governmental dissolution, that you would not stand by the Supreme Court; that you would not accept the vote of the majority. I was not surprised that the Senator did not think that this case had been settled, because a man who will not accept without criticism the vote of the majority of the Supreme Court is not apt to accept without criticism the vote of the great majority of the American people. No; it was the fear, Mr. President——

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I only want to suggest to the Senator the name of a certain distinguished gentleman who would not accept a decision of the Supreme Court without criticism. That man was Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, Mr. President, there has been nothing so gratifying to me as to find gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, after thirty-five or forty years, beginning to quote the words of Abraham Lincoln. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARMACK. I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. It is a very strange condition of things when gentlemen on that side of the Chamber have absolutely ceased to quote Abraham Lincoln. [Laughter.] I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that he may search the Republican speeches of the last four years made upon this floor and in the other House of Congress since this question arose and he will not find a quotation from Abraham Lincoln or from the Declaration of Independence in any of them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, Mr. President; because the condition confronting us was not the condition confronting Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. CARMACK. Ah!

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We do quote President Lincoln upon questions which were before Mr. Lincoln. We stand by him upon the question of sound money and you do not.

Mr. CARMACK. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I will say that somehow or other you have found opportunities to quote from and use arguments that Stephen A. Douglas used in his debates with Abraham Lincoln. Why do you not occasionally quote something from Abraham Lincoln himself?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator states something of which I have no personal knowledge. I know of no Senator who has quoted the arguments of Stephen A. Douglas, because I have not heard, although I was raised in the State where Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln were supported by the people, that either Abraham Lincoln or Stephen A. Douglas had before them the question of colonial administration. The Senator uses catch words and repeats sentences out of speeches directed at another issue, and flaunts them here with rather a crimson eloquence, and then says to us: "Why do you not adopt these things?"—things, Mr. President, which were never uttered in this connection or on this question. That is another instance of non sequitur, to the use of which the Senator from Tennessee seems to be devoted.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the reasons why the Democratic party lost the support of the conservative, moderate, thoughtful, constructive people of this country. I will not fully discuss it, but will merely repeat what the whole world knows, that Mr. Cleveland and other Democrats—Mr. Cleveland especially—left the Democratic party, and others of our party, who did not agree with us in all things, refused to join the Democratic party, because of those principles of dissolution—and Cleveland used a stronger word—which the Senator has announced upon the floor of the Senate this afternoon. Mr. Cleveland and men like him were afraid that if you got into power you would sow the dragon's teeth, from which the country would reap a harvest of ruin. They referred to it as anarchy.

Mr. President, upon analysis I think it will bear that term, for what is anarchy? What is the principle of destruction of free government or any other government? It is that you will not stand by the decision of the majority. What is the principle upon which this Republic is founded? It is that the majority rules; and because you would not then and will not now yield your adherence to that principle you lost the great body of conservative and thoughtful men who formerly belonged to your organization. That is one reason, and not "the full dinner pail," or something else.

There was another reason they would not support you, and that reason has something to do with the present discussion. It is because the Senator's party was sounding a retreat. Let me tell him that the American people throughout their whole history have never followed a leader who was always sounding a retreat, and they never will. It was because you were then, as you are now, sympathizing with those who were shooting at the flag. It was because the great, loyal heart of this country would not respond to those who were calling men who wore the nation's uniform murderers and charity boys and doers of dirty work. That was another great reason why the American people defeated you.

I was surprised to-day to hear the Senator again refer to the oft-reiterated statement, or misstatement, that we were carrying fire and sword and pillage and ruin and rapine through the Philippine Islands; that we had imitated the methods of Weyler in Cuba. I read with some attention the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] made the other day, as I always do, and I observed that he inserted in the RECORD a letter designed to injure this side of the Chamber, from Mr. Stephen Bonsal.

I will answer you, then, in your words, since you make them yours. Mr. Bonsal tells of one of our reconcentration camps in the Philippines. It was established by Major Smith, I think, in the island of Marinduque. Mark, now, how this "Attila horde" swept over that fair island! This is how it was done, as Mr. Bonsal testifies, and you make him your witness.

Mr. CARMACK. I have not quoted him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, are you not in harmony on that side of the Chamber?

Mr. CARMACK. I do not know what Mr. Bonsal says.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] introduced the testimony of Mr. Bonsal. Are you not supporting the testimony of your own witness?

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to say that I am not going to be responsible for a statement I have never read. I did not introduce Mr. Bonsal; I have never read the article referred to, and do not know what was said by him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If you had read it and all other evidence you would not have made the speech you have made. I am willing to excuse the Senator for not having read the testimony introduced by his own side.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I introduced the letter of Mr. Bonsal, who is a Republican, and has been a Republican official holding high place in the Republican party. I introduced it because he made statements therein which I believe to be true. He could not escape from them. I also said that he had made statements at variance with what other men had been making as to the cruelties of concentrating those people. If the Senator from Indiana will agree with everything that Mr. Bonsal has said, then every word the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] has said is also practically proved by Mr. Bonsal's letter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, it is not incumbent upon this side to agree to anything put in by the other side. When they introduce a witness we have got a right to any part of his testimony, according to all the rules of evidence.

Let us see if it is not true. I will make this statement my own, and I will follow it with some other observations. I think it was Major Smith who descended upon this island of Marinduque with one of those Attila hordes of Huns, Goths, and Vandals which ravished, ruined, burned, and slew, according to the Senator from Tennessee, and Major Smith established what has been called by Senators on that side one of the Weyler concentration camps there.

I remember the statement very well. He went through the islands in pursuit of an elusive enemy which never could be overtaken. Every place he went, at every ranch, at every town, it was found that the enemy had gotten their provisions and their stores, and the people said that they had been forced to give them up. It was hopeless by such a process to subdue that island, as the Senator would say, or to establish order over it, as we maintain, short of many years. So there was established there a reconcentration camp.

All the inhabitants who would not openly declare that they were not insurrectos were brought within the lines that were drawn by Major Smith. Then, what followed, Mr. President? Was it the butchery of Weyler? Was it the starvation of Weyler? Was it the disease and death of Spain? Not at all. From every portion of that island food was gathered—purchased with American money, which is a 100-cent dollar, as I will stop to remark, and not a 50-cent dollar.

During the prosecution of that campaign against the insurgents in the field, all of the people of that island within the concentration camp were fed as well as they had ever been in their lives, and not only that, but they were medically attended, and when the insurrection was over, when the last insurrecto had come in and laid down his arms and taken the oath of allegiance to the American flag, the native physicians joined with the American physicians in a written testimonial that the health of those people in that concentration camp was 50 per cent better than it had been in their own homes and under their own arrangements. That is one of the facts, and if the gentleman would read the testimony he would make more statements of fact and fewer of fancy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator be equally explicit and give us the facts within his personal observation, or any official information he has in regard to the dispatch from General Bell that he proposed to make war so terrible that they would want peace and want it bad? Is that true, or is it not?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That was not done whilst I was in the Philippines.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it true or not? I will ask you that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator whether, when war is going on, he would not make it so terrible that the enemy would want peace?

Mr. TILLMAN. That depends on whether I was honestly engaged in a war that was decent and respectable or whether I was engaged in a war of subjugation and infamy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator charge that General Bell believes that he is not engaged in a righteous war and is honestly conducting it?

Mr. TILLMAN. I know there are plenty of officers out there who feel that they are doing dirty work, and they have told me so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Has General Bell told you so?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not seen General Bell.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then why do you bring into this discussion General Bell and General Wheaton and men like those, and proceed to put into their mouths statements of such a character?

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall bring into this discussion, if the Senator will permit me, an Associated Press dispatch from Manila.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now it is an Associated Press man.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, you either have a censorship over there or you have not. I say you have, and you swear you have not. The statements as to the censorship of reports is made by the correspondents themselves, and not by us.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, it is hopeless——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, no. It is hopeless. When Senators on the other side begin to discuss the Constitution and we take them up on that they go to a censorship; and when we show that no censorship exists, then they go to rhetoric upon war, bloodshed, pillage, and murder. Will the Senator stick to one point long enough to make an intelligent discussion?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator were not hopping off and on so many propositions, like a grasshopper, and would stand to one proposition, then I would stick as long as he would. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to admit that the Senator from South Carolina has a monopoly of epithets; and it would not be my purpose, even if I could, which I do not assert, to rival him in the use of epithets, in the employment of which he has risen to such eminence, nor do I believe the Senate of the United States is the forum in which epithets should be used instead of argument.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire, of course, Mr. President, to disclaim the slightest intention of wounding the sensibilities of the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not at all. I am never wounded.

Mr. TILLMAN. All I want is that he shall lay down some statement, or make some argument that we can follow; but I declare he is very much like a will-o'-the-wisp, so that you can not tell whence he comes or whither he goes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not responsible for the Senator's following the argument of myself or anybody else. All we can do is to do the best we can, and if the Senator can not follow us it may be that it is so much the worse for the Senator.

Mr. President, since the Senator asks for them, I will give some of my experiences. I was with the American troops two years ago—these Huns and vandals who burn villages. We entered San Fernando. The only house there that was burned was burned by the retreating insurgents. We entered Tay-Tay, driving the insurgents out, and the only building that was burning was burned by the insurgents. I ask the Senator from Tennessee, to whose remarks I am replying, though at much greater length than I originally imagined I should, if he can name a single town, or more than two, that were burned by the Americans or under American authority. Can he name them?

Mr. CARMACK. I will ask permission to put in the RECORD a statement on that subject.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will be very glad indeed to see it. On the contrary, I think a list could be produced of the property destroyed there, with perhaps two exceptions, and that under proper military order as having been——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. From whom do you get the statement that the insurgents or the rebels, or whatever they are, did all this burning?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. From the American authorities.

Mr. TILLMAN. And is it customary to determine a case from an ex parte statement?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why does the Senator always insist that any statement which comes from American authority is a falsehood, while everything that comes from the enemy is the truth?

Mr. TILLMAN. For the simple reason that in my State when its capitol was burned in 1865 there was an infamous assertion made that we burned it, when we people know we did not do it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We are again back to ancient history, which I respectfully decline to discuss.

I have observed, though not with gratification, that whenever a statement is made upon American authority it is instantly denounced by the other side as a falsehood, and surreptitious statements, the names of whose authors they are not willing to give, are asserted upon the floor of the Senate as the gospel truth. So far as I am concerned, until the contrary is proved, I prefer to give credence to statements that come from officers wearing the American uniform and carrying aloft the American flag. I have never heard that an American uniform was a badge of dishonor, or that the American flag necessarily floated over an army of liars.

Let us pass on for just one moment. We heard in the committee room this morning, as the Senator might have heard if he had been there, of another circumstance of this "vandalism," the execution of the notorious robber and murderer, whom the Senator will probably call an insurrecto patriot, named Prado. Not all the story was told. When that man was finally caught—he who had murdered his own countrymen, he who had burned the property of his own countrymen—when that man was executed by hanging, the people came from miles to see that execution. They could not believe it was actually he who had terrorized them; and, finally, when they saw and recognized his hated features, they gave shouts of joy and exclamations of satisfaction. And proof of that I can bring to the Senator whenever he desires, even though from the discredited source of American officers.

Mr. President, where the American armies have gone and their work has been done—done even in spite of the sympathy and encouragement from the Senator from Tennessee and others—there industry, education, commerce, and peace have been established. You may understand it for yourselves by going to San Fernando and seeing the stores doing business. Why, from Aparri to Manila, clear across the island of Luzon, I am credibly informed that a man unarmed, possibly armed, but at least a man alone and unattended, rode with perfect safety, and this is the result of the work of pillage and ravage and destruction which the American Army is said to be engaged in in those islands.

Mr. President, our military policy has not been so successful as it would have been, it is true, if support of the insurrection had not been got from where it never should have come; but our arms are carried forward in the principles of justice and peace, of order and civilization, and we are not going to retreat from that position.

When the Senator was speaking why did he not mention the work in the Philippines of the hundreds of school-teachers, devoted American women and American men, who are inspired by the missionary spirit as much as ever any man was who was ever burned at the stake? Why did he not mention the work of those enlightened and cultured and civilized men and women? Why did he not tell of the thousands of natives who have now returned to their fields and are tilling them, raising their food without fear, under the shadow of the American flag? I am one of those who believe—you may call it fanaticism or what you please—that the Stars and Stripes can not but be a benefit to any people or to any land over which they float.

Since the Senator from Tennessee has gone into the question as to why his party was defeated, as to why the people have given verdict after verdict against his party, let me suggest that he abandon his war cry of American retreat. Let me suggest a plank for his platform. Quit assailing the courts. Quit assailing American troops. Quit sympathizing with those who are firing upon the American flag. Stand by the courts. Stand by the boys on the nation's firing line. Rally round the flag of your country, and see what will be the effect of that policy of patriotism.

Mr. President, there are some other remarks which I might have wished to make, having become engaged, as I have, in this discussion, but I will not detain the Senate longer. I had no idea when I rose that I should take so much time.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] persists in misrepresenting me. He said I charged on the floor of the Senate that the Philippine Commission had utterly neglected its duties in the matter of arranging those tariffs; that I had sought to make the impression that it had given no attention to the question. The plain answer to that is that it is not so. I did not say anything of the kind, and no man who heard me and understood me could possibly have so interpreted my language.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I simply wish to ask him, then, whether he now admits that the tariff rates adopted by the Philippine Commission were thoughtfully, patiently, and considerately adopted?

Mr. CARMACK. I simply admit that I am in the same position that the Senator from Indiana and everybody else in the Senate are, that I do not know anything on earth about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator must speak for himself on that point.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes, and I can speak for you, too. That is the plain truth about it. The details of that bill were never discussed for one single moment in committee, and there is not, I imagine, a Senator in this body who has ever read the act of the Commission which we are now proposing to enact into a law of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know what other Senators on the committee may have done, but I wish to state that I have examined, with every avenue of information that I could reach, the details of the tariff of the Philippine Commission which we are about to approve. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me just a moment to make an explanation?

Mr. CARMACK. Of course.

Mr. ALLISON. We had not the advantage of the hearings which the Philippine Commission had, and could not have had that advantage, nor had we the advantage of the information that was most carefully collated by the Secretary of War and those under him here; but from all the information that has been furnished to us in the published reports and elsewhere as to its details, I made up my mind, after such examination, that the tariff provisions respecting the Philippine Islands presented a schedule and a system that were intended to promote the interests of those islands, making such rates of duties and such schedules as would tend to promote the industrial interests of those islands, largely reducing the duties, in many instances below what they had ever been before, either under Spanish rule or under the military tariff that was projected after our occupation.

So I had no hesitation, so far as I was concerned, in committee, without going into the actual details as respects every item in those schedules, in giving my approval to the schedules as wise and best for the promotion of the interests of the people who dwell in those islands. And so far as concerns our interests in our own country, I am satisfied, without going into that question at all, that the rates of duty in every instance place us upon an absolute equality with every other country.

I have come to that conclusion from such investigation as I have been able to make, going over the details and the full and exhaustive report of the Philippine Commission as respects the tariff, wherein they show that the Secretary of War took every opportunity to verify what they had done by calling experts in the custom-house in New York, by invoking the assistance of experts in the Treasury, and by making an examination of other tariffs and other schedules.

So I think it is not quite fair, if I may be permitted to say it, for the Senator from Tennessee to say, if he has so stated—I did not hear his statement—that the committee charged by the Senate with the duty of recommending to the Senate a Philippine tariff have not investigated this question.

I would much rather he would bring that schedule before the Senate and, pointing to particular items, say, "Here is an outrage upon the Filipino people that is imposed by this tariff," and let him show to the Senate wherein the recommendation of the committee ought not to be agreed to, rather than to say—what is not true in my case—that I have not given proper and full examination to the report of the Commission and to the schedule they have sent to us for approval.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me?

Mr. CARMACK. I should like a little of this time myself.

Mr. LODGE. I want to say, in reply to what the Senator said, that he did not think any Senator had examined the tariff, that to the best of my ability I examined it and tried to understand it. I mean the tariff of the Commission. Of course, the Senator does not mean that the bill was not read in committee?

Mr. CARMACK. Oh, no.

The Senator from Iowa tells us that he has carefully studied the bill, and that he has come to the conclusion that it is exactly right in every particular. I will venture to say that no five men that ever lived could fix upon a tariff bill affecting the constituents of the Senator from Iowa and make it so perfect that he would not have to go through it and strike out about every other line.

But these men fix up a tariff bill for the people of the Philippine Islands, and the Senator comes to the conclusion that it is exactly correct, and that there is not a wrong figure in it; that there is not one item in it that is not exactly right and proper and correct.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me——

Mr. CARMACK. These five men are the wisest men that ever lived on the face of God's green earth if they were actually able to fix up a tariff bill which was absolutely perfect and which would stand the scrutiny of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, not a flaw being found in it——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARMACK. I will not yield for another speech.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not ask the Senator to. I wish to say that if I stated that this was exactly correct I did not mean so to state. I have never yet seen a tariff bill that has been passed by our own House of Representatives or by the Senate that met absolutely in its detail my approval. There have been many things in every tariff bill passed here that we did not approve, although on the whole we do approve the policy.

What I meant to say, and what I say now is, that from the light I have, this appears to be a general scheme of collecting revenue for the Philippine Islands that is wise and fair and just and more liberal to them as respects the rates of duty than any schedule with which they have ever had experience.

Mr. CARMACK. I have no doubt it is true, it is bound to be true, that no tariff bill was ever passed that was absolutely perfect, but no tariff bill could be brought into the Senate affecting the people in the United States of America that could pass under the eyes of the Senator from Iowa without his finding one single objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. CARMACK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Why is it that he, in his minority report which he has signed, does precisely the same thing that we have done, excepting that he requires that the products of the islands shall come free into the United States?

Mr. CARMACK. What do you mean by doing the precise thing?

Mr. ALLISON. I read now from the substitute:

That from and after the passage of this act said archipelago shall be foreign territory, and all goods entering the United States therefrom shall be subject to the same duties, customs, and imposts as are now, or may hereafter be, prescribed by law for goods entered from other foreign countries.

Mr. CARMACK. That just simply puts the Philippine Islands upon the same footing with every other foreign land. Really it was not necessary to put it there. When we say we treat them as a foreign country, of course they become subject to our tariff law just like every other nation on earth. I do not see what the Senator is driving at. I do not see any point to his criticism.

We propose to make the Philippines free and independent, and when we do, of course our tariff laws will apply to them just as they will apply to every other nation on the face of the earth. That is the meaning of that paragraph. I do not understand at all the point of the Senator's criticism.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to call his attention to another paragraph in the substitute reported by the minority?

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to get through with the one point I am on.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. It will take but a moment, and it belongs in this connection.

The Senator from Iowa called your attention to the fact that you had provided here for the imposition of the full Dingley rates upon all imports into the United States. I call attention to the fact that by the last paragraph of the substitute reported by the minority of the Philippine Committee it is provided that until all these various conditions which are named have been complied with, which carries us a long distance and indefinitely into the future, necessarily—

All laws, rules, and regulations now in force for the government of the islands and the raising of revenue therefor shall be in force, except as the same may be in conflict with this act.

In other words, as I understand the substitute and the report of the minority, the work of the Philippine Commission in the imposition of tariff duties upon importations into the Philippine Islands is expressly approved and indefinitely continned by the action of the minority, if they can have their way about it.

Mr. CARMACK. What the minority proposes in regard to the Philippine Islands is to give them freedom and independence, and in the meanwhile maintain the laws that exist there or that may hereafter be passed in regard to conditions there. That is all there is about it. I am not proposing to discuss that at this time. The point I was making is this: The Senator from Indiana says I have made a very savage criticism on the Commission and on the tariff they have prepared and charged that they did it without any care whatever and without any investigation whatever.

I say that I said absolutely nothing of the kind. I have no doubt that they have given very careful consideration to the bill, and I have no doubt, furthermore, that they are better prepared to fix up a tariff bill for the Philippine Islands than we are or than our committee is, but the fact is that we are legislating in regard to it because it is our constitutional duty to do so, and we are attempting to do something that we are absolutely incompetent to perform.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I understand the Senator to say that we are constitutional, but incompetent.

Mr. CARMACK. I say we can not perform it in the very nature of things. We are not able to deal with that question. The Senator from Iowa himself says that of all the information that went before the Commission not one particle came before our committee.

Whatever independent investigation the Senator from Iowa may have made (and if I had thought of it I would not have included the Senator from Iowa in my statement, because I know he always investigates questions of that sort), and whatever investigation may have been made by the Philippine Commission, whatever hearings they may have had, whatever evidence they may have taken, not one particle of it came before our committee. It was never considered by our committee for one moment. The details of this bill were never read.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CARMACK. I can not yield any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Indiana goes at length into the question why the Democratic party was defeated and finds various reasons for that result. I was not attempting to explain all the causes of Democratic defeat, but supposing the reasons he gives are true, the fact still remains that this one question—as to whether or not we should forcibly seize and hold the Philippine Islands—was not the dominant issue of that campaign. The Senator himself argues that other questions controlled it.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question before he quits his place in the Senate, as I see he is about to do?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The question I wanted to ask the Senator a moment ago was prompted by a remark he made that the details of the tariff adopted by the Philippine Commission had not been laid before the committee of which, I believe, he is a member.

I call his attention to the fact that in the majority report of the committee is embodied as a part of it the tariff schedules as provided and enacted and put into force and operation by the Philippine Commission. This printed document has been on the table of every Senator since the 17th day of January, I believe, when it was officially printed and distributed. It certainly must have been before that committee for a long time prior to their report upon this bill. Do I understand the Senator to say that he has never had an opportunity to examine it before he joined in making a report upon this subject?

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that it was printed in the House report in December.

Mr. FORAKER. It was printed in December. It has been a printed document, I know, and distributed among Senators and Representatives ever since last December.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was upon the table in front of every Senator upon our committee, including the Senator from Tennessee, at the beginning of our examination of this bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Then, if it has been so long a time before the Senator, I should like to know how much time the Senator must have in order to investigate a matter of that kind and make objection to it, if he have any to make?

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. FORAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. CARMACK. Has he read that bill?

Mr. FORAKER. I have not read the bill item by item, but I am not complaining of it. Unlike the Senator from Tennessee, I have absolute confidence in the ability and patriotism and the integrity of purpose of the Philippine Commission, which enacted it. I have entire confidence in the majority of the Philippine Commission, and when they, after considering it, saw fit to favorably report upon it, I would feel safe in accepting their judgment.

If I distrusted that Commission, if I distrusted their work, if I wanted to raise a question about it, I would come here prepared to point out the objections I had to make, and I would not in an omnibus way condemn the whole work, and then when called upon for details turn and ask if some one else had objections to it. I have no objections to it. There may be items in it which I would not upon hearing approve. I do not know how that is, but I am confident that, taken as a whole like other tariff bills, it was the best that five earnest and capable men working for a good purpose were able to accomplish.

Mr. CARMACK. I think the Senator from Ohio has entirely missed the point of my speech. I am not making any attack whatever upon the work of the Commission. I say that I myself have as much confidence in the ability of the Commission to frame a tariff bill as the Senator has. I have no doubt that they have framed a good tariff bill.

The point I am making is that we are compelled by the very nature of the case to surrender our power of legislation, to delegate the legislative power that belongs to the Congress of the United States, to five men 10,000 miles away, and that we are compelled to do it simply because it is impossible for us to understand that question. I am opposed to this country being called upon to legislate upon any question which in the very nature of the case it can not intelligently deal with.

Mr. FORAKER. The effect of the Senator's statement, as I understand it, is that he is opposed generally to the policy of our having anything to do with the Philippine Islands, and his objection is that we should make any tariff law whatever applicable to those islands. He does not object to an item in this bill. If we are to have a tariff bill, he has no doubt that it is as good a tariff bill as could be enacted by this body or any other set of men.

I am in favor of having a Philippine tariff such as this bill has provided for our approval, such as was enacted by the Commission. I have confidence, as the Senator says he has, that it is just and right and is as near an approach to what it should be as men can make it. That being the case, I am content. If it had not been true, I wanted to ask the Senator to give us the benefit of his judgment as to which items here should be criticised. If there are any which in his opinion are not what they should be, we should be glad to direct our attention to them.

We have not delegated our power in the sense that we have no power to revise. It is within the power of this body to correct any item or provision in this bill. If there is any provision, therefore, to which he wants to take exception, point it out and we will give consideration to it. If there be no provision in the bill to which you desire to take exception, and if all is regarded by you as being as good as it can be, then that is the end of the discussion, if we are to have a tariff bill at all; and henceforth we will understand that we are to consider whether or not we shall proceed in the establishment of a government there and in the enactment of a tariff measure.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the rule which has been in force in the Senate ever since I have been here, that when a Senator is recognized by the Chair he obtains the floor, seems to have been changed. I am on the Committee on Rules, but I did not know of the change. It seems to have been changed, however. A Senator rises and asks permission to put a question, and he proceeds to make a half-hour speech.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. TELLER. I do not say the Senator from Ohio did that, but he made quite a lengthy speech.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to remind the Senator that when he rose I asked his permission——

Mr. TELLER. Not to make a speech.

Mr. FORAKER. To make answer to the Senator from Tennessee, and with his accustomed good nature and courtesy the Senator from Colorado yielded.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose, even if I had known he was going to make a speech, I should have yielded to the Senator from Ohio; but it seems to me we have fallen into a very unpleasant way of interjecting speeches into the speeches of other Senators, and sometimes they are so foreign to what the Senator wants to say and has been saying that it is really a little incongruous at least.

Now, Mr. President, I did not get up to make a speech. The Senator from Indiana seemed to think that because I put in the testimony of Mr. Bonsal as to certain things out there I am to be bound by all of Mr. Bonsal's conclusions. Mr. Bonsal is a Republican, as I understand it. Some Senator here has questioned that, because it is said that he was born in Virginia. The other day, after I presented the paper, a gentleman here who keeps in touch with these things very thoroughly handed me the following sketch of Mr. Bonsal, which I did not think it then worth while to read, but now I will read it, and I read it simply because some Senator said he thought Mr. Bonsal was not a Republican. It may be that he is not. For his credit I hope that he is not.

Stephen Bonsal, journalist-author, born in Virginia, 1863; educated at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H.; also studied at Gottingen and Heidelberg, Germany. Served as special correspondent New York Herald in Bulgarian-Servian war, also in Macedonia, in Morocco, and in Cuba; in United States diplomatic service as secretary of legation and chargé d'affaires in Pekin, Madrid, Tokyo, and Korea, 1890-1896. Frequent contributor to the magazines of sketches and short stories. Author of Morocco as It Is, The Real Condition of Cuba, The Fight for Santiago, etc.

As Mr. Bonsal entered the diplomatic service under Mr. Harrison, I assume that he is a Republican. Whether he is or whether he is not, I believe every one here will agree that among the newspaper men and among the people who keep in touch with public affairs he has the reputation of being a gentleman, a scholarly man, and a reliable man. Unless Senators on the other side of the Chamber will admit that everything he says is true, they shall not pick out something that is in their favor and say that is correct and that every other statement he makes is false. I am willing to take this issue and go to the people on that.

Mr. President, when I get the floor with time, I propose to put into the RECORD the annunciations of some public men. I propose, in addition to that, to put into the RECORD a large number of telegraphic dispatches that came from Manila under the censorship, as I say, of the military officers there, and if there are some deductions or conclusions or some suggestions I do not believe in I am not to be bound by those. I want to establish a fact. I want to establish the fact that there is over there a condition which is not hopeful, a condition which does not promise success, a condition which does not promise peace. That is what I desire to show, and I am going to put in the matter for that purpose.

If, as I said the other day, the charge is not true that General Wheaton said certain things, which I believe the subsequent telegram admits he did say, let the committee call before them the people who sent these dispatches. Let us know whether they are true or not. Call General Smith and see whether the order he made for a practical devastation of that country is true. Call the officer who declared that he would make the country so barren that a bird could not live in it. Call him! You will not do it. I will venture now to say that you will not call those men. I am going to put in the RECORD enough to make you call them or you will have to abandon your so-called investigation.

Mr. President, I am not going to debate this question now. I am going to debate it when I can get the floor at a reasonable hour of the day, but not when it is nearly 5 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to ask leave to print in the RECORD certain military orders and newspaper publications that I referred to in the course of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. LODGE. Unless there is some Senator who desires to speak, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 4, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 3, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Melvelle Bull, a Representative-elect from the State of Rhode Island, appeared at the bar of the House, accompanied by his colleague, Mr. CAPRON, and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House the order to-day is the consideration of what is known as the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

REPEAL OF WAR-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. PAYNE. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report to the House the bill for the repeal of the war-revenue taxes.

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means reports the bill for the repeal of the war taxes, and the Clerk will read the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10530) to repeal the war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the views of the minority on the bill just reported and ask to have them printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reports the views of the minority upon the bill, and the bill, the report of the majority, and the views of the minority will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. HENRY of Connecticut was then considered; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee and Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 62, noes 48.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-four members present; not a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I would call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. There not being a quorum present, the Chair will order the yeas and nays——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there being no quorum present, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a dilatory motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There being no quorum present, I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to overrule the point of order on this motion for the first time, at least. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes had it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and there were—yeas 66, nays 188, answered "present" 7, not voting 95; as follows;

So the motion was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. JOY with Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. BOWERSOCK with Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. BISHOP with Mr. NEVILLE.

Mr. SCHIRM with Mr. NEWLANDS.

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill (H. R. 9206).

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

The bill was read at length.

The Committee on Agriculture recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

First, in the title thereof, and in the second line, between the words "the" and "State," add the words "District of Columbia and the."

Also amend said title by adding after the last word, "oleomargarine," the following: "and to amend an act entitled 'An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine.'"

Also amend section 1 of said bill by striking out the word "yellow," being the last word on line 8 of page 2 of said bill.

Also, by adding to said bill in section 2 as follows: "That the first clause of section 3 of the act entitled 'An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine,' be amended by adding thereto, after the word 'oleomargarine,' at the end of said clause, the following words:

"And any person that sells, vends, or furnishes oleomargarine for the use of others, except to his own family and guests thereof without compensation, who shall add to or mix with such oleomargarine any ingredients or coloration that causes it to look like butter shall also be held to be a manufacturer of oleomargarine within the meaning of said act and subject to the provisions thereof."

Also, that section 2 of said bill be numbered 3 and be amended by striking out the word "yellow," in lines 17 and 18 of said bill.

Also, that there be added to said bill a new section, to stand as section 4, as follows:

"SEC. 4. That wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall keep such books and render such returns in relation thereto as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation require; and such books shall be open at all times to the inspection of any internal-revenue officer or agent. And any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this section shall for each such offense be fined not less than $50 and not exceeding $500 and imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months."

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House, favored and reported by a majority of the Committee on Agriculture, is the so-called Grout bill passed by the last House of Representatives, amended by two additional sections intended to strengthen and make the law more effective.

The first and third sections of the bill reported contain the provisions of the original Grout bill. The second section is designed to prevent the coloring of oleomargarine by dealers after its manufacture. The fourth section merely reenacts section 41 of the act of October, 1890, known as the McKinley Act, and remedies a defect in the original law by providing penalties for its violation.

The proposed legislation is not intended to be oppressive or unduly arbitrary, and only proposes adequate protection for the consuming public. It is the manifest duty of the governing power to prevent fraud and imposition upon those unable to protect themselves. Legislation tending to this end is as legitimate as laws for the prevention and punishment of crime and misdemeanors. Pure food of all kinds should be guaranteed to every citizen. The purchaser of all articles of food has a right to know what he is buying and consuming. If disguised, mixed, or blended, the manufacturer should be compelled to disclose the kind and quality of the ingredients used and certify to the purity and wholesomeness of the materials sold to a trusting public. It is not unjust or inquisitional to subject producers and manufacturers to governmental inspection and control. Police supervision has long been exercised over the production and sale of milk and other dairy products. Proper supervision is sought rather than opposed by every honest manufacturer and dealer. Reputable and inviolate trade-marks are invaluable. Manufacturers in all branches of textile and other industries fully realize this fact and carefully maintain high standards of excellence. This is equally true of the producers of cereals and other food products. Why should manufacturers of oleomargarine or butterine be an exception to the general rule? Indeed, it is difficult to understand upon what reasonable grounds manufacturers of honestly made oleomargarine object to the proposed legislation.

The pending majority bill, if enacted into law, will, hopefully, make the manufacture of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter and deceptively sold unprofitable. To this end the internal-revenue tax upon colored oleomargarine is increased from 2 cents to 10 cents per pound, while the tax upon the uncolored article is reduced to one-fourth cent per pound, a nominal tax, merely imposed to maintain Government supervision and police control.

The discrimination between the colored and uncolored will not and is not intended to ruin a legitimate industry. Your committee were strengthened in this conviction by testimony given at the committee hearings by manufacturers of oleomargarine. One manufacturer stated that one-half of his monthly product of 700,000 pounds, or about 350,000 pounds, is uncolored. Another manufacturer, when asked "If, in his opinion, uncolored oleomargarine can be profitably made and sold," replied: "It is sold to some extend already, and I am one of those who believe that oleomargarine, having been used for more than a quarter of a century, there are some people at least who have learned that it is a wholesome and cheap article of food, and will continue to use it. These people, if the colored is not obtainable, will use the uncolored."

In my own State of Connecticut we have had for many years a stringent law effectively inforced prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine when colored, with the result that considerable quantities of uncolored are sold and used.

The reduction proposed in the tax upon uncolored oleomargarine of 1¼ cents per pound, cheapening to that extent the cost to the manufacturer, and presumably to the dealer and consumer, will undoubtedly largely increase the sale of the honest article, to the advantage of those compelled to practice close economies, and especially to the laboring man working for small wages. Should the consumer prefer to eat his oleo yellow rather than white it can be easily and inexpensively colored the shade preferred. Even the small tax imposed upon uncolored oleomargarine might well be omitted were it not indispensable for the maintenance of necessary police powers. In the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a small tax must be levied to maintain Government supervision. In a communication to a member of the Committee on Agriculture Commissioner Yerkes says:

In reply to your inquiry you are informed that it is my opinion that this office can not require from manufacturers of oleomargarine the keeping of books and making of reports showing the quantity of uncolored oleomargarine produced by them in case the internal-revenue tax is entirely removed from such product.

This statement appears conclusive as to the necessity for retaining a small but not burdensome tax upon the uncolored article.

The bill reported by the minority of the committee may appear plausible and reasonable, but it does not meet present emergencies or the demands of the friends of more drastic and restrictive legislation. Furthermore it does not have the approval of all manufacturers of oleomargarine. One representative manufacturer, the largest in New England, and a leading member of the bar in his State, explained that the minority or Wadsworth bill was more objectionable than the majority bill. In this gentleman's opinion it would be preferable for manufacturers to accept and comply with the requirements of the majority bill as the less burdensome of the two measures.

The investigations of your committee develop the fact that the better qualities of oleomargarine are little else than adulterated butter. Reputable manufacturers use a considerable proportion of milk, cream, and butter—in some instances as much as 20 per cent butter fat—mixed with a slightly larger percentage of neutral lard, oleo oil composing most of the remainder. In cheaper qualities cotton-seed oil takes the place of butter fats.

Just here let me say to my Southern friends on the other side of the House, who have been led to believe that this legislation will injure a Southern product, that, in my judgment, the consumption of cotton-seed oil as an ingredient in oleomargarine will not be diminished, but rather increased, by the passage and enforcement of the proposed law, for under its operation there will undoubtedly be a reduced production of the high-grade article and an increased sale of the cheaper qualities, in which cotton-seed oil takes the place of butter fats.

It will readily be perceived that this composition, termed by the manufacturers "gilt-edge oleomargarine," is really adulterated butter, possessing the appearance, flavor, and aroma of high-grade butter, colored a comparatively light yellow, put up in attractive prints, carefully wrapped, and often marked "Creamery butter." It is the most dangerous competitor the dairyman encounters. It is a fraudulent counterfeit that requires only the protection afforded by the minority bill to secure willing customers among unprincipled hotel managers and public caterers.

Properly manufactured from pure materials, the wholesomeness of oleomargarine is not challenged. The only question at issue is: "Shall or shall not oleomargarine be colored and sold in the semblance of yellow butter?" Using the words of ex-Governor Hoard, who ably argued the case from a dairyman's standpoint before the Committee on Agriculture, "It is not oleomargarine the substitute for butter that we are fighting, but oleomargarine the 'counterfeit.'" We do not care how much oleomargarine is made and sold as long as it is so manufactured as not to conflict through deception with the sale of our product. If a man prefers a mixture of lard, tallow, and cotton-seed oil to butter, there is no reason why he should not have it. We do not ask that a single ingredient that is nourishing be omitted from the mixture. He can have it to imitate butter in taste, smell, grain, and consistency—we concede him all this. We only ask one thing—that there be about the product itself some characteristic by which the public can readily distinguish it from an article of food which has been known for four thousand years in the form it is now produced. We demand the distinction in color because there is no nutrition in color.

Its omission will not make oleomargarine the less nutritious or palatable, only so far as it advises the consumer of its true character and thereby arouses his repugnance to taking into his stomach raw lard, tallow, and cotton-seed oil. You may say that chemically this mixture is the same as butter. We will answer that this is not true. No artificial mixture has ever been produced that is chemically the same as butter fat. Nature alone can produce butter. The distinction between a counterfeit and a substitute was clearly drawn in a recent legal decision from which I quote:

A manufacturer may produce an article to be used as a substitute for coffee. He may incorporate into this substance all the elements he desires to make it capable of taking the place of coffee in consumption. Up to this point his business is legitimate. But the minute he goes further and makes the substitute in semblance of the coffee berry in order that it may not be distinguished from coffee, he makes an imitation and counterfeit, and the very fact of his so producing it is an evidence of his intent to deceive the public.

Practically this same measure was passed by the House of Representatives in the last Congress by a vote of 196 yeas to 92 nays, more than a two-thirds majority. There is no apparent reason why the present bill should not receive an equally decisive vote. Certainly every argument offered in favor of the measure in December, 1900, is equally weighty in February, 1902. Conditions have not changed; the clandestine sale of imitation butter has constantly increased. The great dairy interests of the country are still suffering from unfair competition with a fraudulent article, colored, stamped, and wrapped to counterfeit the appearance of the legitimate product of the farm and dairy. This illegitimate and demoralizing traffic is still upheld by interests and influences beyond the power of State governments to successfully regulate and control.

The great consuming public are still unprotected from the imposition of unscrupulous manufacturers. The present Federal laws are obviously inadequate to correct a growing evil, and more stringent measures are demanded. Farmers and dairymen in all sections of the country believe that the bill reported by the majority of your committee, if enacted into law, will, without injustice to the honest manufacturers of oleomargarine, afford a fair and just degree of protection and give needed encouragement to the great farm industries of the country, industries that all will admit form the bed-rock foundation of our national prosperity.

THE INGREDIENTS OF OLEOMARGARINE.

The House of Representatives, during the first session of last Congress, called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the kind of material used in the manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States, the amount of each ingredient, and the per cent that each bears to the total amount of oleomargarine produced in the country for the period named. In response to this resolution the Secretary, through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on May 14, 1900, furnished the following statement:

Quantities and kinds of ingredients used in the production of oleomargarine in the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899; also the percentage each ingredient bears to the whole quantity.

Material.	Pounds.	Percentage each ingredient bears to the whole.

According to the census of 1890, States which have prohibited the sale of colored oleomargarine contain a population of 50,000,000, in round numbers, while the States and Territories whose laws permit its sale, merely requiring that the oleomargarine be marked and labeled so as to distinquish it, contain only 12,000,000 people.

The District of Columbia, with a population of 230,000 in 1890, is embraced in the latter list. According to the census of 1900, the States which prohibit the sale of colored oleomargarine contain a population of about 60,000,000, while the other States contain a population of 14,600,000.

During the delivery of the preceding remarks—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, with his consent, a question.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama as soon as I have concluded what I desire to say in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place, in this connection, certain papers and data bearing upon the subject to which I have referred in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection, and the leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I now yield, with pleasure, to the gentleman from Alabama, who desires, as I understand, to ask a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in connection with a subject to which he referred during the course of his remarks.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As I understood the gentleman from Connecticut, he stated, during the course of his remarks, that this bill was practically the same as what was known as the Grout bill, which has been heretofore considered by Congress—I could not hear distinctly—but I understood the gentleman to say there was no substantial difference between this bill and the other bill to which he referred.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. It is practically the same bill. I stated in the course of my remarks that this bill contained two additional sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But it makes no substantial difference in the proposed law?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. None whatever.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, the chief objection that gentleman makes in the course of his remarks is that this oleomargarine—this product placed upon the market and sold in competition with the dairy product of butter—is that it should not be colored to imitate butter. Is that his point?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is, of course, the principal objection to the manufacture of this product.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Have you made any examination, or did your committee investigate, to determine whether the butter—or a large proportion of the butter—that is sold in the market was a harmless food product?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That question, I will say to the gentleman, was not brought before the committee in that shape.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then, I wish to go a little further. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, as a matter of fact, it is not true that the butter which is sold in the markets of the country is to a greater or less extent colored. Does he, then, in the bill which he brings before the House make that an offense?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Some, of course, is colored.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do you make it an offense to color butter; and is not the coloring of butter a common thing among producers?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Some of it is colored, of course, but yellow is the natural color of butter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not your purpose to obliterate oleomargarine?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, no; it is only in the interest of fair trade, of fair competition, and not the purpose to eliminate oleomargarine.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The oleomargarine trade is perfectly fair, provided it has a good color.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Provided it does not imitate butter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Suppose it was marked "Oleomargarine," would not that be fair?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That would be fair so far as the manufacturer is concerned.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It would do no injustice to anybody if it was marked oleomargarine. You do not believe that a man has not the right to buy an article that is wholesome and healthy?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And the law ought not to prohibit him from doing it?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. This bill would prohibit from doing this absolutely, would it not?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I think it will increase the legitimate sale of oleomargarine. In fact, one of the manufacturers before our committee said that one-half of his product is uncolored.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And cotton-seed oil and hog fat go into its manufacture, does it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question. I think he is mistaken about that. The gentleman he refers to modified his statement or corrected it before the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have the record here. It was Mr. Larsen.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I can get it for you here.

Mr. COWHERD. That is the man who could not understand English.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the gentleman is in error, and I know when he has an opportunity to turn to it he will correct the mistake. This gentleman who is referred to modified his statement.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have it right here, if the gentleman will wait one moment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman. I am willing that the gentleman shall correct the statement if he finds that he is in error.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I can turn to it, and you can see whether I have misquoted the gentleman or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the gentleman has not misquoted him, but he modified his statement subsequently in the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman from Connecticut to say that there were not many changes in this bill from the Grout bill of last session. I wish to ask the gentleman if the last paragraph of the second section is not new.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No, not new; it is a slight change in words. That is all.

Mr. MONDELL. Was the same inquisitorial provision in that section?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. There is only a change of two words from what it was in the Grout bill.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut two questions, if he will yield to me.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. In the first paragraph of your remarks you spoke of the measure as a measure to suppress fraud, and that the suppression of fraud was as legitimate as the suppression or punishment of crime or misdemeanors. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it within the province of the Federal legislature to prevent crimes subject to punishment under State laws by Federal legislation.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is not the meaning of this bill. The original law has been in operation fourteen or fifteen years, and has not been challenged by the manufacturers.

Mr. BOUTELL. The second question that I wish to ask my friend is this: This bill, on its face, and we must take it on its face, is very largely a revenue measure. I would like to ask my friend from Connecticut what increase the committee computes there would be in our national revenues from the enforcement of this law?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is a question of minor importance. The revenue derived from the manufacture of oleomargarine has never been large—never has exceeded $2,000,000 a year. I think the manufacture of high-grade oleomargarine will still continue and pay the 10-cent tax. I think it will very largely offset the loss of revenue under the 1¼-cent tax.

Mr. BOUTELL. Precisely. Has there been any computation as to what that increase will be?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No, sir; that has not entered into the consideration of the committee.

Mr. BOUTELL. But, in the opinion of the gentleman from Connecticut, there would be an increase if this tax is to be collected?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I did not intend to say that. I would say that I do not think there would be a material decrease.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman from Connecticut that the result of the passage of this bill would be to prohibit the sale of colored oleomargarine; that there would not be an increase in the revenues of the Government, but that, as a matter of fact, there would be a very considerable decrease? As a matter of fact, will the quarter of a cent a pound on uncolored oleomargarine pay the expense of collecting the tax?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Possibly it might and possibly not.

Mr. MONDELL. Might not the bill then go toward producing a deficit rather than an increase in the revenue?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, no; but that is a question that has not been considered by the committee. It is a question of minor importance. When the law of 1886 was enacted there was nobody who supposed there would be any considerable revenue resulting from it.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I understand the gentleman to say that the committee, in considering a revenue measure, considered the question of revenue of minor importance.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. They did in this matter.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky and Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I notice, Mr. Chairman, that the minority of the committee, in their report, say, in effect, that the purpose of this bill is to obliterate the manufacture of oleomargarine. I suppose the gentleman would not justify any such purpose as that?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, I do not think it would obliterate it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman would not justify that?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. A manufacturer from a State adjoining the gentleman's State said that if this bill passed he should comply with its terms; and he expected to go on and make uncolored oleomargarine as he is doing now.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That is just what I wanted to bring out from the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I do not think it would materially reduce the consumption of oleomargarine. I think it will be so much cheaper that the laboring man will buy it under the terms of this bill for about 15 cents per pound. He is now paying 20.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is paying 15 cents a pound now.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Adams, the food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, is quoted as having said before the committee:

> There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business.

Was that what he really said?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that fact. Mr. Adams said that before the committee two years ago in the heat of his argument. He has retracted it over and over again. He retracted it at the succeeding Senate hearing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He denied having said it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Well, he has retracted it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a good deal of difference between retracting a statement and denying having made it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. After a man has retracted a thing, I hardly think it should be brought in here.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I had no knowledge of that, and I am glad of the information.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I notice that the latter part of the second section of this bill provides that the product shall be free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter. Does my friend understand that to mean that milk shall be excluded from the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, by no means.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Then I will ask my colleague if that was not the position of Mr. Grout before the committee—that milk would be a coloring matter and ought to be excluded?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I did not hear Mr. Grout in full. I submit to the gentleman that that is not a practical proposition. Milk and cream and butter are only used in the high-grade oleo. As the gentleman learned when he was at Langdon, they are only used in the high-grade oleo; and the use of milk, cream, and butter, as the case may be, will undoubtedly be continued in making what they term their high-grade or gilt-edge oleo. In the low grades, as they told us at Langdon, they use no butter. They use cotton-seed oil as a substitute for butter. Now I do not think the gentleman's question is pertinent in view of that statement.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact of the manufacture of oleomargarine by the Standard Butterine Company. I think he stated a while ago that half of it was uncolored.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have that here.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on the 15th of January Mr. Larsen, who testified before the committee, in a letter to Mr. L. L. Powell, said:

> LANGDON, D. C., January 15, 1902.
> DEAR SIR: After making my statement to-day I believe to have stated that one-half of our output was uncolored. If that is the case it is a great misrepresentation. I must have had my thoughts directed on Denmark, where they call butterine uncolored; still there is a small per cent of butter color in. I meant to say that one-half of our output was a light color and one-half a high color, like butter is colored.
> I hope that you will be able to rectify same to-morrow, when, as I understand, you are going before the committee.
> I remain, very truly, yours,
> A. LARSEN.
> Mr. L. L. POWELL.

That is directed to Mr. Powell. Here is one directed to the Committee on Agriculture:

> GENTLEMEN: As per request of your honorable committee as to the quantity of uncolored oleomargarine which has been manufactured by the Standard Butterine Company, we beg to report that during the three months of our existence we have churned over 2,000,000 pounds of our product, and of this amount only one churning (about 3,000 pounds) has been uncolored. One-half of this latter amount was returned by the party to whom it had been delivered on account of it being unsalable.
> Very truly, yours,
> STANDARD BUTTERINE COMPANY,
> THOMAS I. DONNELLY, Secretary.
> The COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
> House of Representatives.

That is the correction I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Now, as my statement has been challenged, let me quote——

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I admit that is the statement.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. SMITH asked Mr. Larsen, "Do you manufacture any white butterine?" Mr. Larsen: "Yes."

> Mr. SMITH. About what proportion?
> Mr. LARSEN. Very nearly half of our output.
> Mr. SMITH. How much white oleo do you make and manufacture—about?
> Mr. LARSEN. I can not give it in exact figures; it is, more or less, half of our output.
> The CHAIRMAN. What is your output?
> Mr. LARSEN. It is about 700,000 pounds a month.
> The CHAIRMAN. And about 350,000 pounds of uncolored oleomargarine?
> Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Now, if Mr. Larsen retracts, it is his privilege; but I think I can not be challenged in my statement.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. He does not retract; he simply corrects his statement. The gentleman justified Mr. Adams in a retraction after he had seen the effect of his statement, and now I think he ought to grant Mr. Larsen the right to correct his statement.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Larsen has an undoubted right to retract. My attention has not been called to his retraction until now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question. Stripping this controversy of all verbiage and getting at the heart of the proposition, is it not the purpose of the bill, by the abuse of the taxing power of the Government, to destroy one of the legitimate industries in order that the price of butter may be enhanced to the consumer?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, no, no; I say, decidedly, no.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman answer another question? How much more will the consumers of butter have to pay for butter, when they eat it, after this bill becomes a law?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Not one cent, in my opinion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then who will receive this benefit?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. It will benefit the laboring man that will buy oleomargarine for 15 cents where he now pays 20.

Mr. CLAYTON. How can the gentleman demonstrate that? Will this not destroy the oleomargarine industry?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No; it will not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why was it, let me ask the gentleman, that the committee struck out the word "yellow" on page 2 of the bill?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Well, there was a difference of opinion, I may say, in the committee, and as that is a committee secret I prefer not to go into it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman answer one more question? Why is it, if you are so anxious to protect the people against fraud, your committee did not provide for the taxing of renovated butter? Isn't that a fraud on the consumer when it is sold to them as pure, fresh butter?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the gentleman from Alabama will introduce a bill and have it referred to the Agricultural Committee, I guarantee it will receive consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. That question was up to your committee. That proposition was distinctly offered to you in the last Congress, and it is offered to you now, and I will offer it as an amendment to this bill. Will the gentleman from Connecticut support it?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No. That is another proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman answer this question frankly? Is it not the purpose of the Dairy Union and your purpose, by legislation, by the abuse of the taxing power of the Government, or a stretch of the commerce power of Congress, to tax it and outlaw a legitimate industry—the manufacture of wholesome oleomargarine?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will say—and I trust the gentleman will credit me with candor—that I would not be a party to any such legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then what good is going to be accomplished by this bill? You say that it does not raise any revenue for the Government; you say it does not enhance the price of butter; and if it does not benefit the farmer in the sale of the butter, and raises no revenue, tell me where the good can come in.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, well, the gentleman can have plenty of time to put that into his argument.

Mr. CLAYTON, I want the gentleman to answer it. He got up here to defend the measure.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will answer questions, but not an argument.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, I ask the gentleman again, will the Federal Government be benefited one dollar by the taxation from this measure?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is a minor consideration, but the Federal Government will derive some benefit from the taxation.

Mr. CLAYTON. What amount of taxes will the Government derive from this source?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I can not answer.

Mr. CLAYTON. The butter maker or the farmer whom you are so anxious about—how much benefit will he derive from this measure?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, well, the farmer is the best judge of that for himself.

Mr. CLAYTON. You say that this tax is not going to enhance the price?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The farmer is here asking for this legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON. What farmer is here? The butter trust, I suppose, which was formed in Kansas City a few days ago, is asking for this measure, and also the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The farmer is here asking for this legislation through members of this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me a question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. As throwing some light on the question, What is the intent of the sponsors of this bill? I wish to ask the gentleman if the president of the National Dairy Union did not make the following statement before the gentleman's committee?

To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation.

Did not the president of the National Dairy Union make that statement?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I quoted from Governor Hoard in my remarks. I do not think I care to go into that question.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask the gentleman whether there was any higher authority on this subject offered before the committee than Governor Hoard. Was there before the committee any gentleman representing more thoroughly the dairy interests?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I dislike very much to grade the authorities that appeared before the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Did not Governor Hoard appear for a very large class of butter makers?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. He represented the National Dairy Union.

Mr. MONDELL. We must take it for granted that whatever he said before the committee was by authority of the gentlemen he represented; and if he considers this repressive taxation, they so consider it, and that such is their intent in urging the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, I am always willing to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to say that this measure if enacted would lower the price of white or uncolored oleomargarine——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. And that that was one of the good features of the bill——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman believes in the sale of white or uncolored oleomargarine to people who wish to buy it?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I know it is being sold in my State in considerable quantity. Dealers take out licenses to sell it.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe that if under this bill white oleomargarine is to be encouraged the retail tax of $48 a year for the privilege of selling it ought to be removed?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I do not think I care to go into that subject. That is another proposition altogether.

Mr. MANN. Well, as I understand, the gentleman has given a good deal of attention to this matter——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have not brought up that question in my remarks, and I prefer not to go into it.

Mr. MANN. I wish to derive information from the gentleman, if I can.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I do not think I am able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that he is not informed as to the amount of retail tax we now impose on the sale of uncolored oleomargarine? Has the gentleman presented this bill without any consideration of that subject?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The tax is $48 a year.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think there is any reason why the person who sells white oleomargarine should be required to pay a tax of $48 a year?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the interests that the gentleman and his colleagues and others represent on this floor will agree to vote for this bill, and present as a condition that an amendment should be offered here reducing that tax, I am inclined to think that the majority of the Committee on Agriculture will accept the proposition; but that question is not at issue at this time.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that the only "interest" I am representing on this floor in connection with this question is the interest of the people—something which at present the gentleman from Connecticut, I think, is not representing in the bill before the House.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is only a matter of opinion.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman assumed that I was representing an "interest."

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me a question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Following up the line of interrogation pursued by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], allow me to say that I understood my colleague on the committee [Mr. HENRY of Connecticut] to state that this tax of one-quarter of 1 cent per pound would be necessary in order that the Government might have supervision over the manufacture of the article.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I so said in my remarks.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Now, is it not the assumption of the gentleman that the tax of 10 cents per pound will absolutely obliterate this product, so that the Government will not need to oversee its manufacture?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, I think not.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time I have occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I reserve the remainder of the time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, my views upon the subject presented by the pending bill are so well understood by the House that I do not deem it necessary to say but a very few words in expressing my opposition to the report of the majority of the committee.

I might say, in the beginning, however, that I was delighted to hear the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] admit that oleomargarine was a wholesome and proper food product.

This subject has been under discussion many times in the House, but I never heard an admission of that kind before to-day.

The members of this body should be willing to accept that statement as entirely authentic and worthy of their belief, and it goes a great way toward clearing up the many misconceptions regarding this food product and clears the atmosphere to a great extent.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this proposed bill of the majority of my committee because it injures and hampers an honest industry in that it forbids it to offer its product to its trade in the form and appearance demanded by that trade and takes no cognizance of the fact that every manufacturer of butter colors his product to suit the demands of his trade.

I oppose it because it punishes the manufacturer for a fraud committed, not by him, mark you, but by the retail dealer in butter. He is the man who commits the fraud that is complained of. He buys the oleo from the wholesale manufacturer in wholesale quantities. He takes it to his shop and takes it down into his cellar. You go there and want to buy a pound of butter, and he scoops you out the oleo and sells it to you for butter. That is a fraud, and that fraud ought to be stopped, and that is the purpose we have in view in the minority bill. The manufacturer should not be punished. No additional burden should be put upon him when he is not committing a dishonest act.

I oppose it, Mr. Chairman, because I believe, though I am not a lawyer, that it is unconstitutional. But I shall leave that point to be argued by some of the able lawyers on the floor of this House. It is class legislation, for it seeks to favor one industry as against another. It asks Congress to injure and hamper, if not ruin, one agricultural industry in favor of another agricultural industry.

And right on that point I want to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who put a question to my friend from Connecticut in regard to the intent of the men who have urged and pressed this bill upon the Committee on Agriculture for the last three winters. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] quoted Governor Hoard, and I will quote him further.

On January 13, 1902—that is, this year—in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, Governor Hoard, replying to a question as to whether this bill (H. R. 9206) "would be demanded if after its passage just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," answered:

In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

He did not say that in the heat of debate. He said it in cool blood.

I oppose this bill because, in my opinion, it does not in any way lessen the possibility of fraud on the part of the retail dealer in butter; for just as long as oleomargarine can be bought in large bulk, as it now is, so long will the greater opportunity be given to the dishonest retailer to commit the fraud.

The minority bill, in the opinion of the minority, proposes to curtail the possibility of fraud by demanding that the manufacturer sell it and manufacture it only in pound and 2-pound prints, properly marked, wrapped, and stamped. On this point, when we reach it under the five-minute rule, I shall try to give an ocular demonstration of the workings of the bill proposed by the minority.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman has not presented one aspect of this question which has been called to my attention and to which I should like to call his attention—whether it is not our duty to our country to vote for this bill in order that we shall preserve to our respective constituencies the advantages of experienced and well-trained Representatives? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is the main reason for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not believe I can answer that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That question answers itself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It answers itself. Now, with these few remarks I shall leave it to others to go more into detail into this subject, and under the five-minute rule I may have something further to say. I reserve the balance of my time, although I should be glad to answer any questions that I am able to answer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question or two before he takes his seat. I notice in the first section of the bill reported by the committee——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The majority bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the majority bill there is a proviso authorizing State legislatures to control the sale of oleomargarine in their respective States, provided they shall not prevent or prohibit the sale of the product if its real character is such that it does not perpetrate a fraud. You will notice in the last part of section 1 it says:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Now, I understand butter is one of the ingredients of oleomargarine, and so sold. This is my question: Does not this bill by this provision prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine from going into the market and buying colored butter to use as one of the ingredients in the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It certainly does.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because it would make his product look like butter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Indiana will excuse me. It goes further than that. It does not go only to the point of merely looking like butter, which is an ingredient, but giving it the semblance of butter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But the inquiry in my mind is whether the oleomargarine manufacturer can go into the market and buy marketable butter to use in the manufacture of oleomargarine under the provision that I have called attention to.

Mr. COWHERD. That is not the only harm in this. It gives additional force to the law of those States that have compelled the coloring of oleomargarine pink, blue, and other colors before they can be sold.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does.

Mr. COWHERD. For all oleomargarine is made in imitation of butter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think it is made in imitation of butter.

Mr. COWHERD. It does imitate butter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is made just as it is. It happens to resemble butter.

In connection with the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I desire to call attention to this paragraph of the bill:

And any person that sells, vends, or furnishes oleomargarine for the use and consumption of others, except to his own family and guests thereof without compensation, who shall add to or mix with such oleomargarine any ingredient or coloration that causes it to look like butter shall also be held to be a manufacturer of oleomargarine within the meaning of said act and subject to the provisions thereof.

Now, if they use a little too much butter, milk, or cream in the manufacture of oleomargarine and thereby give it a slight yellow tint, then they are guilty of fraud under this proposed law of the majority.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is because I represent, in part, a State whose people are chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits, and especially that of dairying, who have expressed to me, both by petition and by letters, their strong desire that legislation affecting the production and sale of oleomargarine colored in a way that causes it to look like butter and sold as butter in competition with the honest product of the cow, may be enacted at this session of Congress that I ask the indulgence of the committee for a short time; legislation which will protect the farmer and the dairymen, who compose the great majority of the electorate of the United States, who produce annually 1,500,000,000 pounds of an honest and legitimate article for consumption and export, which has been known and called butter ever since Jacob tended the herds of Laban and Moses kept the flocks of Jethro, his father-in-law, the priest of Midian, and who also represent 70 per cent of the wealth of this country.

There exists in this country to-day a society known as the Patrons of Husbandry, having a membership of more than 500,000 farmers, representing all political parties, organized for the purpose of elevating, educating, raising the standard of that most honorable of all occupations, and for the advancement and protection of their interests by State and Federal legislation that will relieve them and the products of their labor from unfair and dishonest competition. This large society, having its representatives in every State and Territory, and representing in a marked degree the intelligence and wealth of the whole land, came before our committee in the person of their chosen chief, the Hon. Aaron Jones, of Indiana, master of the National Grange, and protested that their incomes had shrunk by reason that the product of their farms had been placed in competition with adulterated, colored, and fraudulent articles made in imitation of the honest product by unscrupulous, money-making adventurers, and in the name of the people he represented earnestly appealed to the Congress to unite with the legislatures of the various States in the inauguration of a system of laws that will bring every person producing and selling articles in the markets of the country up to the plumb line of rectitude and honesty.

Thirty-two States of the Union, representing 60,000,000 of its entire population, have already enacted laws forbidding the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine when made and colored in imitation of butter. By repeated decisions of the courts it has been settled that the State has the power, through its legislature, to control the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within its own borders. To this effect might be cited several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the last of which that has been brought to my attention is that of The Capital City Dairy Company, plaintiff in error, vs. The State of Ohio ex rel. attorney-general, decided January 6, 1902.

It will be asked, if the State has the right to protect its citizens against the manufacture and sale of a fraudulent product, what is the necessity for intervention by Congress? Since the decision of the case of Plumley vs. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461) and that of Schollenberger vs. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 1) there has been a lack of uniformity of decisions by the lower courts, some judges holding that the decision of the latter case overruled that of the former, and other judges holding the contrary.

The Plumley case arose under a statute of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts prohibiting the sale of any substance made in imitation of yellow butter produced from pure, unadulterated milk or cream of the same, and that statute contained a proviso that—

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Plumley was convicted under that statute for selling a compound known as oleomargarine, colored in imitation of yellow butter. The case was taken to the supreme court of that State, which held the statute valid.

The defense contended that the statute was unconstitutional, and brought up the case under a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. In December, 1894, the decision was handed down, affirming the judgment of the State court. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, makes use of this very strong and pertinent language:

> And yet it is supposed the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought for by people in every condition of life are protected by the Constitution in making a sale of it against the will of the States in which it is offered for sale because of the circumstance that it is in an original package and had become a subject of ordinary traffic. We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of the opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its markets any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may by reason of such coloration or adulteration cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy.
> The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public. The deception against which the statute of Massachusetts is aimed is an offense against society. The States are as competent to protect the people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of a more serious character, and this protection may be given without violating any right secured by the national Constitution and without infringing the right of the General Government. A State enactment forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food in general use among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to citizens of the United States, nor in any just sense interfere with the freedom of commerce among the several States.

In the case of the Capital City Dairy Company vs. The State of Ohio, Justice White, who delivered the opinion of the court, says:

> In the Plumley case, the power of the State, in legislating for the prevention of deception in the manufacture and sale of imitation butter, was held to extend to the prohibition of the sale of oleomargarine artificially colored so as to look like yellow butter, although brought into Massachusetts from another State.

We can not overlook the principle decided in the well-considered case of Leisy vs. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), known as the "original package" case, in which it was held that intoxicating liquors shipped from the State of Illinois into the State of Iowa might be lawfully sold in the latter State, in the original package in which it was exported or brought within the State, notwithstanding the statute of Iowa forbidding the sale. This Iowa statute was, therefore, held to be in derogation of the term "commerce among the States," and an unlawful interference with the right of interstate commerce.

It is now claimed by the friends of oleomargarine that the Plumley case, or the decision in that case, so far as it related to the question of interstate commerce, was expressly overruled by the majority of the court in the more recent case of Schollenberger vs. Pennsylvania. In the opinion handed down we find the following language with reference to the importation of a product of another State into the State of Pennsylvania:

> We hold that, in the absence of Congressional permission to do so, the State had no power to interfere by seizure or any action in prohibition of importation and sale by the foreign or nonresident importer.

It is in consequence of this apparent, though to my mind unreal, conflict in the decisions of our highest judicial tribunal that has led up to a good deal of conflict of opinion with lawyers and courts in the administration of our State oleomargarine laws.

After the decision had been handed down in the Iowa original-package case the friends of prohibition came to Congress, and the result was the passage of the law known as the Wilson Act (26 Stat. L., 313), which provided that intoxicating liquors shipped from one State into another State should be subject to the laws of the latter State upon their arrival therein, whether in the original package or otherwise.

And it is now that, by reason of this conflict of opinion among lawyers and this apparent conflict of decisions by the courts and the difficulty experienced in enforcing the State laws in certain given cases, especially in those cases where the principle of interstate commerce is involved, that the friends of honest food—those who believe that the manufacture and sale of an imitation product or article of food is a cheat and a fraud, and, in the language of Justice Harlan in the Plumley case, "is an offense against society"—have come to Congress, and invoke its aid for the suppression of the article of food known as oleomargarine, when colored in such a manner that it looks like butter, and by that means deceive and "cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy." And this is all the friends and supporters of the bill reported by the majority of the committee have ever asked or do now ask.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be misunderstood when I say that the friends and supporters of the bill reported by the majority of the committee are not here opposing the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as such. From the evidence given before the committee I concede its manufacture to be a legitimate industry, as the Congress, by its past legislation, has held the manufacture of whisky and lager beer to be a legitimate industry subject to its regulation and taxing power. I am ready to concede that it is healthful and nutritious, as is the oil of the fish, of the olive, the fat of the beef, and all other oils and fats when properly prepared and made free of all impurities and adulterations. The friends of this measure have no purpose or desire to crush out the oleomargarine industry when prosecuted along legitimate lines.

The friends of the dairying interests of the country and those engaged in the manufacture and sale of butter made from pure and unadulterated milk or cream have nothing to fear from the production of oleomargarine when put upon the market in its natural state. It is the artificial coloration that is given to it that causes it to look like butter, and by means of which coloration the manufacturers and dealers are enabled to put it upon the market as butter, and do put it upon the market as butter; advertise and sell it for "pure creamery butter," "pure dairy butter," "pure grass butter," and "pure Elgin creamery" butter, as is shown by the photographic reproduction of a representative Chicago retail oleomargarine store which I hold in my hand. And what is true of this store is also true of hundreds of others in this country, especially in our larger cities. This is sold to the unsuspecting purchaser at prices ranging from 15 cents to 22 cents per pound as appeared in evidence before your committee, the purchaser believing he was buying and receiving genuine butter made of pure milk or cream, but instead thereof was paying, at a fabulous profit, for nothing else but colored oleomargarine made to resemble butter.

Are not such operations fraudulent and an offense against society, to say nothing of the injury it works to the producer of honest butter? And will the representatives of States which have, through their legislatures, pronounced against oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter refuse to stamp out this fraud, this deceit, and a lie, by omitting to enact such Federal legislation as is absolutely necessary to enable the States to safeguard their citizens? The majority bill will accomplish this result; the minority bill does not nor will not.

I notice that the minority of the committee, on page 9 of the printed report, state that the advocates of the legislation proposed by H. R. 9206 do not hesitate to declare that it is their wish and expectation that the passage of that bill will eliminate oleomargarine from the market as a food product, and in substantiation thereof quotes a statement as having been made by Mr. H. C. Adams, pure food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

> There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business.

Mr. Adams is a gentleman of recognized ability and needs no defense from me. Still, I can not but feel that the minority of the committee have treated Mr. Adams unfairly in incorporating into their report the quotation I have just read, in view of the statement made by him before the committee Monday, January 18, 1902, and which was stenographically taken and reported. Let me read from what he then said:

> Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hardly think it is necessary to enter upon any very extended or elaborate argument with reference to the various measures pending before this committee regulating the tax or changing the tax upon oleomargarine. I think it is proper, however, for me to make something in the nature of a personal explanation at the outset.
> At the last session of Congress I appeared before the committee in behalf of the Grout bill. At the first meeting the discussion was by Governor Hoard, and I followed. There was no stenographer present at that meeting. My remarks on that occasion were misunderstood. I do not for a moment wish to state or have the committee think I have any impression that they would deliberately misstate; by no means. I was here at that time representing largely, as I believe, and as I know, the dairy sentiment of my State upon that subject. I was also here representing a department for my State which is charged with the enforcement of the various food laws. I said on that occasion that there was no use in beating the devil about the stump, and our purpose in coming to Congress with this bill providing for the 10-cent tax on butterine was to practically prohibit the business of manufacturing oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HASKINS. I would prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to thank you for answering the question that your colleague declined to answer.

Mr. HASKINS (continuing)—

> Some gentlemen on the committee misunderstood that. They understood me to say that it was our deliberate purpose to crush this business of manufacturing oleomargarine.
> I want to say to you, gentlemen, that any representative of the dairy interests or of any other interests that takes this position, here or anywhere else, is occupying an absolutely ndefensible position in my judgment, and no intelligent or fair-minded representative of that interest can afford to take any such position.

Further comment is unnecessary, except to say that the position of Mr. Adams as stated by him in the extract from his remarks which I have just read is the position of every person that I have heard express himself in favor of this proposed legislation. No one has any objection to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in its natural state or condition, but the contention is, and with reason, too, that it should not be made in imitation of butter, colored in imitation of butter, and sold for butter.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that oleomargarine was manufactured in but 11 of the United States during the last fiscal year and that the production amounted to 104,943,856 pounds; withdrawn and tax paid on 101,432,717 pounds; 3,507,193 pounds were withdrawn for export; 722,237 pounds were remaining in the factory June 30, 1902.

Under the provisions of the majority bill, if uncolored, this entire production would pay a tax of but $262,359.64 as against $2,098,877.12 under the present rate of taxation at 2 cents per pound, a saving to the manufacturer of $1,836,517.48 in the way of taxation on a production equal to that of last year.

It is claimed by some manufacturers of oleomargarine that if a tax is imposed upon the colored article to the extent provided in the majority bill it practically prohibits its manufacture, will most seriously cripple the industry and drive them out of business, while other of the manufacturers who appeared before the committee believe they can work up an excellent and profitable business with the uncolored. If it is the "poor man's" butter, as has been earnestly claimed by the friends of oleomargarine, there can be no doubt about the latter proposition. It was shown that in Denmark, with a population of but 2,000,000, they annually consume over 31,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine, and nearly all of it, if not the entire production, is uncolored, and that they annually export $37,000,000 worth of butter into Great Britain alone. The amount of oleomargarine exported from there was not furnished the committee. If uncolored oleomargarine can be profitably produced in Denmark it certainly can be in this country, with all our inventive genius and improved methods for the adaptation of labor-saving machinery. Let oleomargarine be oleomargarine still and butter be butter still, that each may be sold for what it really is. It is now sold in considerable quantities in this country, as shown by Mr. Adams and others, pages 222–223 of the record.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], while the rule for the consideration of this measure was under consideration last Friday, stated that while he was in favor of the adoption of the rule he was "uncompromisingly opposed to this legislation and all kindred legislation," and one reason he gave was because "it is a proposition to introduce into the forum of Congress a measure to permit the taxing power of the United States Government (when there is no necessity for raising funds) to be used for the purpose of destroying a great industry, and by consequence building up another industry."

The gentleman is evidently mistaken in the purpose of the legislation asked for as well as in the results which will follow if the measure is enacted into law. The legitimate butter industry requires no building up; it has been with us from time immemorial, and it will remain with us for all time to come. The butter industry of the country stands upon its own merits and is able and willing to fight its own battles with any other honest and legitimate industry. It has no complaint to make against oleomargarine as such. It is only against the fraudulent devices of the manufacturer of oleomargarine of which they complain—the coloration of their product made to resemble butter so perfectly that at a comparatively small cost the oleomargarine manufacturer is enabled to dispose of it at a large profit as and for genuine butter.

It is said the revenue that will be derived from the taxation of oleomargarine is not needed for the purposes of the Government. We grant all that; but we further say that if nothing but uncolored oleomargarine is manufactured the revenue derived under the provisions of this bill will be infinitely less than what it now is, as I have conclusively shown. The measure is not one for revenue, but for the restriction of an article of food when fraudulently prepared so that it can be sold for another food product which it is not.

The power of taxation is not always employed for the raising of revenue. Mr. Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution, Book I, pp. 677–678, says:

> Nothing is more clear from the history of nations than the fact that the taxing power is often, very often, applied for other purposes than revenue. It is often applied as a virtual prohibition; sometimes to banish a noxious article of consumption; sometimes as a suppression of particular employments.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCullough vs. Maryland (4 Wheaton, p. 428), says:

> That the power to tax involves the power to destroy is a proposition not to be denied.

In 1864 Congress passed a law imposing a tax amounting to about 10 per cent on all currency issued by State banks. This was clearly intended not as a measure for the raising of revenue, but as one of prohibition, for the result was State banks went out of existence and the act was held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, which declared as follows:

> The tax can not be held invalid for being so excessive as to indicate a purpose to destroy the franchise of the State banks.

Further citation of authority is unnecessary to establish the proposition that Congress has the constitutional power to impose a tax of 10 cents a pound upon colored oleomargarine made to look like butter, even though its imposition will absolutely prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter, which is the purpose of the proposed legislation. The tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound on uncolored oleomargarine is imposed simply to keep the manufactories under Federal supervision, which, as stated by Mr. Tillinghast, president of a large oleomargarine manufactory in Rhode Island, was preferable to no supervision at all.

The friends and advocates of oleomargarine have appealed to the live-stock industry of the country, making them believe that the enactment of this measure into law will ruin the butterine or oleomargarine industry, and by means thereof their steers will bring to them on an average $2 less than they now receive and hogs 50 cents less per head. This is an argument purely mercenary, an appeal to the pocket, and not to honesty and fair dealing as between men engaged in different industries. The statement with reference to the difference in the price, I believe, is an overestimate, for others full as well informed and having the same means of information assert that it will not exceed 25 cents per head for steers and 5 cents per hog. But, as I have said, this is looking at the mercenary side of the case, and, as legislators, it ought not to cut any figure here or have the least weight in determining anyone's action on the proposed measure, though an appeal to the pocket often has its effect, even upon men charged with the performance of a public duty.

If this tax of 10 cents per pound will prevent the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored so as to cause it to look like butter and enable it to be sold as butter, it should be imposed in the interest of good morals and honest methods, to say nothing of the benefits that will accrue to the farmers and dairymen of the country. I believe it will work out its purpose by raising the price of the colored article to the extent that it will remove the temptation for the practice of dishonest methods which large profits in business transactions are quite sure to encourage.

The second section of the majority bill is quite essential and important and should be enacted into law. The committee saw it demonstrated while on their visit to the factory of the Standard Butterine Company, located within about 2 miles of this Capitol, that a retail dealer of oleomargarine, purchased in an uncolored condition, hotel proprietors, and boarding-house keepers can, with the use of annotto and a wooden paddle, in a few minutes' time convert a lump of uncolored oleomargarine into an article colored that will look like butter. This they will do in order to set before their guests an article of food which in its appearance is butter and which they are made to believe is butter. Such a practice would be deceptive and dishonest and can be prevented by the adoption of this second section, which was incorporated into the bill for that purpose.

What is demanded of us by the best citizenship of this country is that we shall enact a law that will place upon the markets of the country an honest article. In conclusion I quote the language used by Mr. Jones, master of the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, in his statement before the committee: "The time has come when the American people want to get back to the good old system of doing business that is square and honest between man and man. So whatever we undertake we insist that the man who sells us the article must make his representations true and right. This is the principle upon which this Republic has prospered in the past; it is the principle upon which it will prosper and must prosper in the future." [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the majority bill and the whole of the report of the minority of the committee, which includes some scientific testimony and the substitute bill, as a part of my remarks.

There was no objection.

A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like yellow butter.

SEC. 2. That on and after July 1, 1902, the tax on oleomargarine as prescribed in section 8 of the act approved August 2, 1886, and entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," shall be one-fourth of 1 cent per pound when the same is not made in imitation of yellow butter; but when made in imitation of yellow butter the tax to be paid by the manufacturer shall be 10 cents per pound, to be levied and collected in accordance with the provision of said act.

The report and substitute bill are as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives beg leave to submit the accompanying bill, which we offer as a substitute for H. R. 9206.

We first wish to bring to the attention of the House proof positive that oleomargarine is a wholesome and nutritious article of food, and is therefore entitled to a legitimate place in the commerce of our country. In substantiation of this statement we beg to submit the following testimony:

OPINIONS OF LEADING SCIENTISTS.

"Prof. C. F. Chandler, professor of chemistry at Columbia College, New York, says: 'I have studied the question of its use as food, in comparison with the ordinary butter made from cream, and have satisfied myself that it is quite as valuable as the butter from the cow. The product is palatable and wholesome, and I regard it as a most valuable article of food.'

"Prof. George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania, says: 'Butterine is, in my opinion, quite as valuable as a nutritive agent as butter itself. It is perfectly wholesome, and is desirable as an article of food. I can see no reason why butterine should not be an entirely satisfactory equivalent for ordinary butter, whether considered from the physiological or commercial standpoint.'

"Prof. Henry Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, New Jersey, says: 'I am able to say with confidence that it contains nothing whatever which is injurious as an article of diet, but, on the contrary, is essentially identical with the best fresh butter, and is superior to much of the butter made from cream alone which is found in the market. The conditions of its manufacture involve a degree of cleanliness and consequent purity in the product such as are by no means necessarily or generally attained in the ordinary making of butter from cream.'

"Prof. S. W. Johnson, director of the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, and professor of agricultural chemistry in Yale College, New Haven, says: 'It is a product that is entirely attractive and wholesome as food, and one that is for all ordinary and culinary purposes the full equivalent of good butter made from cream. I regard the manufacture of oleomargarine as a legitimate and beneficent industry.'

"Prof. S. C. Caldwell, of Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., says: 'While not equal to fine butter in respect to flavor, it nevertheless contains all the essential ingredients of butter, and since it contains a smaller proportion of volatile fats than is found in genuine butter, it is, in my opinion, less liable to become rancid. It can not enter into competition with fine butter, but so far as it may serve to drive poor butter out of the market its manufacture will be a public benefit.'

"Prof. C. A. Goessmann, of Amherst Agricultural College, says: 'Oleomargarine butter compares in general appearance and in taste very favorably with the average quality of the better kinds of dairy butter in our markets. In its composition it resembles that of ordinary dairy butter, and in its keeping quality, under corresponding circumstances, I believe it will surpass the former, for it contains a smaller percentage of those constituents which, in the main, cause the well-known rancid taste and odor of a stored butter.'

"Prof. Charles P. Williams, professor in the Missouri State University, says: 'It is a pure and wholesome article of food, and in this respect, as well as in respect to its chemical composition, fully the equivalent of the best quality of dairy butter.'

"Prof. J. W. S. Arnold, professor of physiology in the University of New York, says: 'I consider that each and every article employed in the manufacture of oleomargarine butter is perfectly pure and wholesome; that oleomargarine butter differs in no essential manner from butter made from cream. In fact, oleomargarine butter possesses the advantage over natural butter of not decomposing so readily, as it contains fewer volatile fats. In my opinion, oleomargarine is to be considered a great discovery, a blessing for the poor, and in every way a perfectly pure, wholesome, and palatable article of food.'

"Prof. W. O. Atwater, Director of the United States Government Agricultural Experiment Stations at Washington, says: 'It contains essentially the same ingredients as natural butter from cow's milk. It is perfectly wholesome and healthy and has a high nutritious value.'

"Prof. Henry E. Alvord, formerly of the Massachusetts Agricultural College and president of the Maryland College of Agriculture, and now Chief of the Dairy Division of the United States Department of Agriculture, and one of the best butter makers in the country, says: 'The great bulk of butterine and its kindred products is as wholesome, cleaner, and in many respects better than the low grades of butter of which so much reaches the market.'

"Prof. Paul Schweitzer, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry, Missouri State University, says: 'As a result of my examination, made both with the microscope and the delicate chemical tests applicable to such cases, I pronounce butterine to be wholly and unequivocally free from any deleterious or in the least objectionable substances. Carefully made physiological experiments reveal no difference whatever in the palatability and digestibility between butterine and butter.'"

Professor Wiley, Chief of the Division of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, also appeared before the committee and testified to the nutritive and wholesome qualities of oleomargarine.

The Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate, in a report dated February 28, 1900, finds, from the evidence before it, "that the product known commercially as oleomargarine is healthful and nutritious."

Dr. George M. Kober, professor of hygiene, Georgetown University, District of Columbia, says:

"As a teacher of hygiene I have urged upon my students for years to bring the merits and nutritive value of this food stuff to the attention of the public, and in the interest of the wage-earners of this country to correct, as far as possible, the prejudice which has been created against the use of this product, provided, always, it is sold under its true name and at its real value. In this opinion I am glad to be supported by the highest scientific authorities in this country and abroad."

Charles Harrington, assistant professor of hygiene in the medical school of Harvard University, in his Manual of Practical Hygiene, 1901, page 112, says:

"Oleomargarine has been misrepresented to the public to a greater extent, probably, than any other article of food. From the time of its first appearance in the market as a competitor of butter there has been a constant attempt to create and foster a prejudice against it as an unwholesome article made from unclean refuse of various kinds, a vehicle for disease germs, and a disseminator of tapeworms and other unwholesome parasites. It has been said to be made from soap grease, from the carcasses of animals dead of disease, from grease extracted from sewer sludge, and from a variety of other articles equally unadapted to its manufacture."

The truth concerning oleomargarine is that it is made only from the cleanest materials in the cleanest possible manner, that it is quite as wholesome as butter, and that when sold for what it is and at its proper price it brings into the dietary of those who can not afford the better grades of butter an important fat food much superior in flavor and keeping property to the cheaper grades of butter which bring a better price. Oleomargarine can not be made from rancid fat, and in its manufacture great care must be exercised to exclude any material however slightly tainted.

Judge Hughes, of the Federal court of Virginia, in a decision, says:

"It is a fact of common knowledge that oleomargarine has been subjected to the severest scientific scrutiny, and has been adopted by every leading government in Europe as well as America for use by their armies and navies. Though not originally invented by us, it is a gift of American enterprise and progressive invention to the world. It has become one of the conspicuous articles of interstate commerce and furnishes a large income to the General Government annually."

Believing that this testimony establishes beyond controversy that oleomargarine is a nutritious and wholesome article of food, the main question to be considered is the complaint that fraud is practiced in its sale.

In this connection the minority directs attention to the fact that the charge of fraudulent sale is not made against the manufacturer. It is conceded that the manufacturers of oleomargarine make no effort to evade the existing law, but that their product is always so marked and branded as to advise the customer who buys direct from the manufacturer as to the nature of the product.

It is charged, and doubtless truly, that the present law is violated by unscrupulous retailers. In view of these two facts, viz, that the manufacturer does not violate the law, and that by reason of his being constantly under the eye of Government inspectors there is no danger of his doing so, and that the retailer does violate the law (when it is violated), the minority holds that the only proper legislation is that which directs the penalties against the retailer and not against the manufacturer; in other words, against the man who commits the crime and not against the man who does not. H. R. 9206 violates this fundamental principle of equity and jurisprudence by directing its penalties against the manufacturer, who is already surrounded by such restrictions as to effectually prevent even the attempt at fraud, while it in no way either diminshes the temptation or increases the difficulty involved in the violation of the law by the retailer.

The fact just stated, that H R. 9206 is directed against the manufacturer (who is not even charged with violating the law) and not against the retailer, through whom, if at all, the fraud is committed, seems to justify the conclusion that the real object of this measure is to prevent the use of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, and not merely to stop the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter. Indeed, the radical advocates of the legislation proposed by H. R. 9206 have not hesitated to declare that their wish and expectation is that the passage of this bill will result in seriously crippling the oleomargarine industry and the elimination of oleomargarine from the market as a food product.

In substantiation of this assertion we quote the following:

Mr. Adams, pure-food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, said:

"There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business."

Charles Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, in a letter to the Virginia Dairymen, dated May 18, 1900, writes:

"Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers, who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand."

W. D. Hoard, ex-governor of Wisconsin and president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

"To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation."

And on January 13, 1902, in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, the same witness, replying to the question as to "whether this bill (H. R. 9206, or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," said:

"In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax."

In view of this testimony (and much more of a similar character might be cited) the minority feel amply warranted in claiming that the purpose of H. R. 9206 is to cripple the business of the legitimate oleomargarine manufacturers. In just the extent to which this purpose is realized Congress will be responsible—in the event of the passage of H. R. 9206—for injuring or ruining one American industry at the demand of another; a thing which, as all will concede, Congress ought not to do. The minority believe it to be class legislation of the most pronounced kind and would establish a precedent which, if followed, would create monopolies, destroy competition, and militate against the public good.

THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

The purpose of the substitute bill, offered by the minority, is not to prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine or its legitimate sale, but to prevent it from being fraudulently sold for butter. To accomplish this end it throws such safeguards about the retail sale of the article (the only operation in which, under existing law, it is possible for fraud to be committed) as, in our opinion, to entirely eliminate all possibility of fraud in such retail sales and compel all dealers in oleomargarine to sell it for what it really is and not for butter. The substitute offered is really an amendment to sections 3 and 6 of the existing oleomargarine law. The annual licenses for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine ($600 for manufacturers, $480 for wholesalers, and $48 for retailers) are not lessened, while the penalties imposed for violation of the law are materially increased.

The minority respectfully submit that the enforcement of these provisions would effectually eliminate all possibility of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, and that, in our opinion, is as far as Congress can legitimately go.

One of the claims made by the friends of H. R. 9206 and similar measures is that it will protect the interests of the farmer. We call attention to the fact that every ingredient that enters into the manufacture of oleomargarine is as much a product of the farm as is butter, and that such ingredients are made more valuable on account of their use in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

In support of this statement we cite the following resolution adopted by the National Live Stock Association at its meeting in Chicago, December 3, 1901:

"Resolved, That the National Live Stock Association, in convention assembled, representing more than $4,000,000,000 of invested capital, reiterates its former expressed disapproval of such class legislation as the old Grout bill, and we protest against the passage of any law of this nature, firmly believing that such legislation is unjust, unconstitutional, and unfair, and not to be tolerated in a free country."

The National Live Stock Association is a voluntary organization, comprising 117 subordinate local organizations of the cattle, sheep, and swine raisers and breeders of 26 States and Territories of the Union, and representing more than four billions of invested capital.

The annual meeting at which the foregoing resolution was adopted was attended by 1,500 delegates, and we submit that the unanimous protest of the accredited representatives of substantially all the live-stock interests of the United States (except those engaged in the dairy business) is entitled to respectful consideration. Representatives of this association, and also representatives of the cotton industry, came before this committee and were unanimous in expressing the opinion that the enactment of such legislation as is contemplated by H. R. 9206 would lower the price of their products and materially damage their industry.

The minority directs attention also to the significant fact that the passage of House bill 9206 (or similar measure) is demanded solely by the producers of butter and not by consumers, who might naturally be supposed to ask for protection from a fraudulent product if they felt themselves in need of it. On the contrary, the consumers, as represented by hundreds of labor organizations representing many thousands of workingmen, have protested against the passage of this measure as one calculated to deprive them of a cheap, wholesome, and nutritious substitute for butter.

The claim that the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine interferes with the growth and prosperity of the butter industry is not borne out by the evidence before the committee. Statistics show that the total manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States last year was 104,000,000 pounds, as against 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter. As to the amount of oleomargarine sold fraudulently, exact statistics can not, of course, be obtained, but it would certainly be a liberal estimate to place the sum of the fraudulent sales at 25 per cent of the total product. Is it reasonable to suppose that the price of the 26,000,000 pounds thus fraudulently sold materially affected the price of the 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter used? Even assuming that the total oleomargarine output was sold fraudulently, it yet represents so small a proportion (about 7 per cent) of the total amount of butter produced as to render it unlikely that it in any way reduced the average price of butter.

And as further supporting the conclusion that the butter industry is not materially damaged by the sale of oleomargarine, the minority directs attention to the significant fact that those sections of our country which are most exclusively devoted to the dairy interests are blessed with the greatest prosperity, as brought out in the testimony of ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, before our committee, who said that a few years ago land was worth only $15 an acre in that State, but as the State began to be devoted more exclusively to the dairy interests land had rapidly appreciated in price, and that farmers had gotten out of debt, had paid their mortgages, and the land is now worth the sum of $80 per acre, this price averaging much higher than agricultural lands in other parts of the country.

In conclusion, the members of the Committee on Agriculture who have joined in this minority report beg to assure the House and the country in the most solemn manner possible that it has been their earnest intention, and is now their determination, to do everything possible to be done to enforce the sale of oleomargarine as oleomargarine and to prevent its sale as butter. To prevent fraud and not to injure or hamper a legitimate industry has been and is our purpose. We believe that it ought to be the sole purpose of all legislation and the sole motive of all just men.

The substitute bill presented by the minority is as follows:

[Bill offered as a substitute for H. R. 9206 by the minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives.]

A bill to amend sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows:

"Manufacturers of oleomargarine shall pay $600 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

"Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein; but a manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own production only at the place of its manufacture in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $48 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein. And sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section, and to the persons upon whom they are imposed: Provided, That in case any manufacturer of oleomargarine commences business subsequent to the 30th day of June in any year, the special tax shall be reckoned from the first day of July in that year, and shall be $500."

"SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word 'Oleomargarine' in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed thereon in distinct letters, and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word 'Oleomargarine,' with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2-pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be, at all times, so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirements of this act.

"Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine otherwise than as provided by this act, or contrary to the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made in pursuance hereof, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who shall sell or offer for sale as butter any oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for the first offense not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and for the second and every subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than sixty days nor more than two years."

J. W. WADSWORTH.
WM. CONNELL.
CHAS. F. SCOTT.
JOHN S. WILLIAMS.
HENRY D. ALLEN.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the bill relating to oleomargarine as reported by the majority of the Committee on Agriculture is the most unjust and vicious measure in principle ever submitted to a legislative body. To begin with, the bill is not properly named. It should be entitled "A bill to create a butter monopoly, by throttling legitimate industry." [Applause.] I can not understand, Mr. Chairman, how any fair-minded man can vote for this bill, especially when he has the alternative of voting for the entirely just and proper measure proposed by the minority of the committee.

Let us examine briefly these two measures and see what it is they would accomplish if enacted. The majority bill on its face provides that oleomargarine shall be subject in any State to the laws of that State. Now, as 32 States, through their legislatures, have been prevailed upon to pass laws forbidding the manufacture and sale therein of oleomargarine colored in resemblance of butter, if this bill should become a law such colored oleomargarine manufactured in other States could not be taken into and sold in those 32 States, even in the original packages. This would at once deprive oleomargarine of the larger part of its market, and the rest of it would also be swept away by the other provision of the bill, namely, that all oleomargarine colored to resemble butter shall be taxed 10 cents a pound. In other words, this bill is simply aimed at the total and utter destruction of the oleomargarine industry.

This is plainly evident from the wording of the bill, and what is more, it is acknowledged openly and defiantly by the promoters of the bill. Several of them have said so, in plain English, in their testimony before the committee, and all the others might as well have done so, for their purpose is perfectly obvious to everybody. This is absolutely all there is to the committee's bill—a barefaced, naked attempt to break up and ruin an industry which is just as proper and legitimate as the butter industry, and has been pronounced so by the Supreme Court of the United States and by other courts, and also by leading scientists, and by the great American public at large speaking through their representatives in Congress.

The Supreme Court's language was, in its celebrated decision of 1898, the Schollenberger case, just referred to by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS], that "oleomargarine had become a proper subject of commerce among the States and foreign countries." Yet in the face of this decision of our highest court it is now coolly proposed by the promoters and sponsors of this bill to wipe out the entirely proper and legitimate industry of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. And why? This is not stated in the bill; but in the reports and remarks on the subject oleomargarine is referred to as an "adulterated article of food," and a "deceitful article of food."

The charge of adulteration, Mr. Chairman, is absolutely false. The ingredients of oleomargarine are as pure and wholesome as the ingredients of butter. They have been so characterized by dozens of the highest scientific authorities in the country, as is well known by everybody—by such a man as Professor Chandler, of Columbia University; Professor Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania; Professor Johnson, of Yale University; Professor Atwater and Professor Wiley, of the United States Agricultural Department, and by many others as eminent.

The article has been in common use by millions of people for many years, and no injury has been received from it by anyone, nor any complaint made about it by anyone except by the dairymen and butter monopolists. It is as nutritious and as wholesome as butter, and in many respects it is more so. It is as sweet and as palatable, and it is far cheaper, thereby enabling those of moderate or restricted means to obtain a perfectly satisfactory substitute for butter at a price within their ability to pay. And now these butter monopolists would deny to thousands—I might say to millions—of poor people the use of this, a perfectly pure and healthful substitute, on the false charge of adulteration. They make a great ado with their sneers about "hog fat," but, Mr. Chairman, it is not the oleomargarine men, but the butter men, who are showing a disposition to "hog" it in this competition.

Coming now to the charge of deceit; what do they mean by that? Much has been said about it by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS], and what is meant by deceit? If it is meant that the honest manufacturers and sellers of oleomargarine practice any deceit in the disposing of oleomargarine as oleomargarine, that charge is as false as the charge of adulteration; but if it is meant that some unscrupulous and dishonest dealers sell oleomargarine as butter, that of course is deceit, and the friends of oleomargarine are just as anxious as the friends of butter that it should be punished and put a stop to. No doubt much of that sort of deceit has been practiced in various parts of the country from time to time, and that is in reality the only complaint made against the present oleomargarine law that will hold water at all.

Now, the friends of the pending bill propose to prevent this deceit, not by punishing those who are guilty of it, nor by preventing them from having any opportunity hereafter to pursue it, oh, no, but by uprooting and annihilating the whole oleomargarine industry! That is very much, Mr. Chairman, like curing a man's cough by cutting his head off.

The friends of the minority or substitute bill, on the other hand, earnestly urge the members of this body and the public at large, to examine this measure and judge of it fairly and impartially. If examined in this spirit the substitute bill will certainly convince anybody and everybody that it covers fully this point of "deceit," which is the only valid point against oleomargarine, and that it provides fully for the prevention and punishment of those who are guilty of deceit in the premises. The substitute bill provides—

That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word "Oleomargarine" in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word "Oleomargarine" printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word "Oleomargarine" printed thereon in distinct letters, and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word 'Oleomargarine,' with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2 pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be, at all times, so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirements of this act.

Now, by the terms of this substitute bill each 1 and 2 pound package is made an original package, and retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed. In that way, Mr. Chairman, every separate piece of oleomargarine exposed or offered for sale would bear its title on its face and would be known to all men for what it really was. What more than this could be asked by any reasonable man? Here is oleomargarine, already recognized and defined by our Supreme Court as a lawful article of commerce between the States, and here are those who manufacture and sell it, ready and willing and anxious to manufacture and sell it for what it really is, and to stamp its proper name on each and every package of it.

And here, on the other hand, are the butter monopolists, who are hurt by its sale, and who say, "No; we will not let oleomargarine be sold at all—we will crush it out of existence." For that, Mr. Chairman, is what they will do if they can pass their bill. They will impose a prohibitory tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine, which would raise its price to a level where nobody could afford to buy it; and, more than that, they will forbid it to be sold in 32 States of the Union at any price.

But at once we are met with their indignant protest that they do not oppose oleomargarine—only oleomargarine colored in the semblance of butter; and they say that the manufacturers may make as much oleomargarine as they wish if they do not color it yellow. They even go so far as to propose a reduction of the tax on uncolored oleomargarine from 2 cents a pound to one-fourth of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. Chairman, is not this an absolute "give away" of their whole position? Would they concede this great reduction if they were not sure it would do oleomargarine no good? There would be no objection to this plan if the people would buy the uncolored article, but they will not. For some reason, partly from pride, perhaps, but mostly from habit and prejudice, people want their butter, or whatever they use in place of butter, to be yellow.

For ages they have been accustomed to have it yellow, and they will not have any other color. As is well known, not all butter is yellow, naturally. Sometimes it turns out very light colored—almost white—but it is never offered for sale in that condition, because it could not be sold. The first thing they do with such butter is to color it yellow before sending it to market. There is no deceit in this, because everybody understands it.

Neither is there any deceit, Mr. Chairman, in coloring oleomargarine yellow. The only deceit is in selling oleomargarine as butter; and the substitute bill if enacted into law will put a stop to this wrongful and injurious practice, injurious even more to the legitimate oleomargarine industry than to the legitimate butter industry.

The provisions of the substitute bill, by compelling all packages or separate pieces of oleomargarine to be stamped with the word "oleomargarine," at once overthrow the allegations of the butter monopolists, that oleomargarine is a "deceitful imitation" of butter. It is nothing of the kind. It is proud to stand on its own merits and to answer to its own name. It believes itself to be as good and as pure and as wholesome and as honest as butter; and it is colored yellow simply because the people want that color.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do they want that color in oleomargarine or in butter?

Several MEMBERS. Both.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. In both. I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota where the butter people get a monopoly on the color?

Mr. TAWNEY. In nature.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I deny that assertion. Butter made at this season of the year will come out almost white.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it will be yellow.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the testimony of a leading dairyman of Pennsylvania, Mr. Sharpless, printed in Senate Report 2043, page 228, wherein he testifies that butter does not come out uniformly yellow; that very often it comes out white, and that he always colors his butter yellow before he sends it to market.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to interrupt, I wish to cite the statement made by Dr. Wyley before the House committee in the hearings at the last session of Congress, showing that large quantities of white butter, and I believe in some instances rancid butter—carloads of it, I believe, he said—have been shipped to Elgin, Ill., the home of the great Elgin creamery, and there renovated and doctored by putting coloring matter into it and sending it broadcast through the country as pure, fresh Elgin butter.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. That is very true; and in that connection I want to say that many times while on my way from my home city, Chicago, to the capital I have seen at the railway stations along through Indiana and Ohio piles and piles of tubs of rancid butter ready to be shipped to the same creamery mentioned by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the Elgin creamery. That is a very common thing.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the committee has recommended an amendment to the bill, defining manufacturers of oleomargarine and prohibiting the continuance of the practice referred to—that is, the coloring of oleomargarine in imitation of butter.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, this substitute bill will produce the desired result of honest dealing far more surely than the majority bill, which simply imposes a prohibitory tax of 10 cents a pound, which would be evaded by dishonest manufacturers and dealers, just as the provisions of the present oleomargarine law are evaded by them, only more easily, because under the pending bill those dishonest dealers could buy all the uncolored oleomargarine they wished at a very low price, and then color it themselves, and then sell it as butter.

In this connection, I wish to call attention to a statement made by the majority of the committee in a paragraph of their report, which will be found on page 3. They say that during the course of their investigations they have ascertained the fact that uncolored oleomargarine can be easily and quickly colored without melting or apparent injury to the product; in other words, that the simple injection of a little coloring matter into a firkin of uncolored oleomargarine will bring it out a bright sunflower yellow. That is the condition you are going to bring about. You are going to give people who want to commit fraud a better opportunity for committing it.

Mr. LAMB. I am unwilling to interrupt the gentleman, and if I occupy his time unduly I will give him some of mine. But I wish to remind him that the majority bill defines who are manufacturers, and that those persons who sell oleomargarine that they have colored in imitation of butter will be punished for so doing.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. What we are trying to get at is to prevent fraud, and that will not prevent it.

Mr. LAMB. We think it will.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I have shown that it will not. Persons disposed to commit fraud will find it easier to commit it under the provisions of the majority bill than under those of the substitute. Penalties have never prevented the commission of crime where there is an incentive and persons willing to commit it. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from my statement made a moment ago that the legislation proposed by the majority will not prevent fraud; on the contrary, it will be an incentive to the commission of fraud. To prevent fraud, and not to throttle a lawful industry, should be the purpose of any legislation we may enact on this subject. On the other hand, there would be absolutely no chance or opportunity to evade the plain provisions of the proposed substitute bill.

Mr. Chairman, the pending majority bill is in the interest of a class—a small class—the butter manufacturers.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many of them are there?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I am not informed as to the exact number.

Mr. TAWNEY. About 5,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman evidently means there are that many farmers, and the majority bill is not for the especial benefit of the farmers, but for the benefit of the dairymen and butter manufacturers, and they comprise but a small, almost an infinitesimal, fraction of the number mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield a moment I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] how much the butter yield is and how much the butter demand of the American people is. When these questions are answered we shall know how short the butter supply is. We all know the principle of political economy that the scarcity of an article enhances its price. And in connection with the speech of a gentleman over there about the 500,000 "grangers," I hope the gentleman from Illinois will answer him in behalf of the millions who can not buy high-priced butter.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I was coming to that. The gentleman is stealing my thunder. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I just wanted you to answer that point made on the other side.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. As I was saying, the bill is in the interest of the dairymen and butter manufacturers. It aims at the creation of an absolute monopoly which would combine to send up the already high-priced butter to higher prices, and compel the poor men—the millions of men just referred to by the gentleman from Alabama—to either pay those high prices or go without anything with which to sweeten or soften their crust of bread.

The substitute bill is in the interest of the great mass of people, not only those who wish to use oleomargarine, but also the great multitudes who would be injured by the establishment of a butter monopoly in the midst of our community.

The promoters of the pending bill claim that that bill is in the interest of the farmer; but still more is the substitute bill in the interest of the farmer. All the ingredients of oleomargarine are the products of the farm, and they are much greater in value and much more in number than the ingredients of butter.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to explain the provisions of these two measures with absolute fairness and impartiality, and I challenge anyone to show wherein I have failed to do so.

The pending bill is simply an odious piece of class legislation, a dangerous and a gross violation of the taxing powers of the Government, an attempt to build up one industry by ruining another industry, and to create a monopoly in one of the most universal and desirable classes of food. Its effect would be to annihilate at one blow the business of a large number of good citizens who are engaged in a perfectly lawful and useful occupation, and by increasing the price of butter, to take away from the poor man's table one of the few simple luxuries that he can afford.

The substitute bill, as I have shown, is carefully drawn so as to provide against the possibility of any further violation of the present oleomargarine law, and to make it certain that hereafter oleomargarine shall be sold everywhere as oleomargarine and nowhere as butter. Is not this just and fair and just to all concerned? Oleomargarine has been guaranteed a good food by the best scientific authorities and a lawful article of commerce by the Supreme Court. It resembles butter in appearance, but is not a "counterfeit" of butter, and wishes to be sold and bought only for what it is—a good, honest, pure, wholesome, inexpensive food.

In the name of the great toiling mass of the people throughout this country, in the interest of fair play, in the interest of correct principles of taxation, for the sake of the fair name and honor of our country, I protest against this proposed piece of class legislation [applause on the Democratic side], and I earnestly urge the members of this body to pass the substitute bill, and by so doing win the blessings of posterity and an approving conscience. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee will pardon me for the time consumed in submitting a few observations on this measure when I direct attention to the magnitude of the interests in my State menaced by it.

Texas is not alone the first cotton-producing State in the United States, growing one-third of all the cotton here grown, but she is also first in the number of her cattle, having more than one-seventh of all the cattle in the 3 Territories and 45 States of the Union. In my State are also more cotton-seed-oil manufacturing establishments than are found in all the other States combined. If this bill becomes a law, both the cotton planter and stockman as well as the cotton-seed-oil manufacturer will be seriously affected.

Now, I purpose to discuss this bill in a spirit of perfect fairness, but at the same time I intend speaking with the utmost candor. The first provision or section of this bill is based upon the theory that Congress has the power, acting for the General Government, to surrender back to the States the power delegated by them to it in the organic law to regulate commerce among the several States.

It is my deliberate judgment that the framers of the Constitution did not intend we should attempt to exercise any such power. I am familiar with the decisions of the court of last resort bearing on this point, but, nevertheless, I believe we have no such power, and if this bill ever becomes a law and the issue is squarely presented to the Supreme Court of the United States I believe it will so hold, although I would not be so bold as to say it would not be another five to four decision.

But, Mr. Chairman, aside from this, the proposed bill is a species of vicious legislation, and if successful, and the Supreme Court should uphold it, I indulge another prophesy: That as a precedent it will often return to this body, to plague and perplex its membership. Selfish interest behind other products and industries will readily take encouragement by this legislation to attempt similar legislation. We may expect bills to be brought forward requiring beet sugar to be labeled to distinguish it from cane sugar, or, perchance to lay a tax on the latter on some pretext or other in the interest of the former. Well may members from the States of Michigan, Nebraska, and Colorado consider the dangers to threaten, if a precedent like this be established. Doubtless during this session an effort will be made to tax "shoddy" or to tax woolen fabrics containing cotton, then immediately the contest will be on between the wool-growing sections and the cotton States.

And I doubt not that, with the usual abandon and disregard of consistency which characterizes the conduct of the average Republican, we will find some members opposing this measure who will advocate that, notwithstanding it involves the same vicious principles.

Who can forecast what product or commodity is to be next assaulted or from where the attack is to come? As I see it, the only safe course is to oppose all such legislation.

Mr. Chairman, what is the real purpose of this measure? Is it to raise revenue? Let us see. It is known to all that by reason of a most burdensome war tax, laid unjustly and inequitably in many particulars, the Treasury is overflowing, and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that millions—yes, hundreds of millions—of dollars have been expended in the prosecution of a cruel and un-American war in the Philippine Islands. As long ago as January 10, 1900, the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, speaking of the revenues of the Government in a letter to this body, used this language:

> The revenues are now largely exceeding disbursements from month to month, and seem likely to do so for an indefinite time.

The official Treasury statement for to-day shows that, notwithstanding the expense for the military and naval establishments for the month of January, 1902, exceeded the expenditures in their support for the same period of time in 1901 by over a million dollars, still there was a surplus for the month of $8,033,866. This statement also shows that we have an available cash balance of $174,746,646.42. And speaking of this very measure when he was called before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. Lyman J. Gage, used this pointed and significant language:

Of course I only feel at liberty to state my views as Secretary of the Treasury, and only upon that part of the bill which involves a question of revenue. I might have personal views which go far beyond them, but you would probably not care much about them.

There is, in my opinion, an objection to the bill on either theory. If it is a revenue producer it is superfluous, we do not need it. If it is not a revenue producer, then the title of the bill is a misnomer and it is inoperative in the name of revenue.

It seems upon either theory there are serious objections to it.

A revenue measure, indeed. Why, Mr. Chairman, the hollow pretense and hypocrisy of that contention was thoroughly exposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], the gentlemen from Illinois [Messrs. BOUTELL and MANN], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] when they interrogated the gentleman having this measure in charge. He was unable to answer even approximately how much revenue his measure would raise and admitted that, so far as he knew, no calculation or estimate had ever been attempted.

Consequently I feel that I am warranted in contending that it is not intended as a revenue measure. It does not even come from the committee chargeable under the rules of our body with dealing with matters of taxation. Now, as a matter of fact, from whence does it come and what is its real purpose? It is admitted by all that it did not originate with the Committee on Agriculture, and I say that it did not originate with any member of this House.

I am quite sure it did not originate with the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], and for authority for this statement I offer the misguided but thoroughly reliable gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY]. I am equally sure it did not originate with the learned gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], and for authority for this contention I offer the ambitious but honorable gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. In fact, I will acquit all members of this House of its authorship, for a large per cent of those who will vote for it apologize in private for their pitiable attitude with reference to same. [Loud applause.] I will tell you where it originated and who brought it here. It is a measure founded upon unrestrained selfishness and greed, and has been brought here by that aggregation of individuals who confess they organized alone for the purpose of this legislation, and they denominate themselves "The National Dairy Union." What is its purpose? It has for its real purpose the utilization of the taxing power to accomplish the total destruction of one industry, which is admitted to be a legitimate one, in order that another may be made more profitable.

Notwithstanding the tax which now burdens the sale of oleomargarine, the insatiable dairyman, vanquished in the field of open, fair competition, seeks now, by means of pernicious class legislation, to break down and destroy his competitor. I say destroy; now, can the charge be substantiated? Let us see. We have the admission of the president of the National Dairy Union, who, while advocating this bill before the Senate committee, used this language:

W. D. Hoard, president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

"To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation."

The advocates of the bill on this floor now flee from the utterance of its advocate before the committee, and we are given to understand that he now apologizes for it, or attempts to modify or deny it.

But it seems he testified before another committee.

On January 13, 1902, he came before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, and replying to the question as to "whether this bill (H. R. 9206—or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," said:

In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

They have also attempted to deny this statement. Then I will offer more testimony. Mr. Adams, pure-food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, appeared before the committee and I heard his statement, and he is one of the vice-presidents, I believe, of the National Dairy Union, and testified as follows. I read from the report:

There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business.

Gentlemen, do you still doubt that the selfish dairy interests are trying to avoid competition by having you (the Congress) aid them by destroying the competitor? If so, permit me to read to you from a letter written by Mr. Chas. Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, to the Virginia Dairyman. This is not denied by any person. He says:

Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand.

Mark you, he says the Grout bill—and that is this bill—"will eliminate the manufacture of this article [oleomargarine] from the food-product list."

Do you need more to give you an insight to the real purpose behind this measure? Its purpose is one of destruction, and not honest taxation to raise revenue.

Now, gentlemen, it is plain that to "repress," "drive out of business," and to "eliminate the manufacture of oleomargarine" is their real purpose. Is it not an unjust and unrighteous purpose? If these gentlemen's words are to be taken with reference to that purpose, is there a man upon this floor so brazen that he will not admit that this legislation is not alone wrong in principle, but mean in spirit? [Applause.] Do they want to protect the public at large from the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as creamery butter, as their advocates upon this floor contend? If so, drastic provisions are embodied in the substitute measure covering every opportunity to practice a fraudulent sale.

It is admitted that no fraudulent sales are made by those who manufacture oleomargarine. No one here or elsewhere contends that they have resorted to any fraudulent practices, and yet the provisions of this bill punish them for what they have not done. The advocates of this measure refuse to join in the substitute which is aimed at the retail dealer who is admittedly the party who does the wrong, if wrong is done.

If you are honest in your expressed desire to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter, then I invoke your serious consideration of the substitute, and invite your aid to perfect it, if you can find one particular in which it can be improved. I assure you I heartily join you in the desire to prevent fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, but I will not yield to the demand that is being made here to destroy, by an abusive use of the taxing power, the manufacture of oleomargarine, rather than prevent its fraudulent sale by the retail dealer.

But to resume the thread of my discussion, where is the demand for this legislation coming from? It does not come from those who make oleomargarine, neither does it come from those who consume it. The great mass of laboring people, who confessedly are the consumers of a major portion of the oleomargarine, are protesting against the passage of this bill. Every member of Congress has been flooded with petitions and protests, originating with labor organizations, urging that we vote against it, earnestly pleading that a table article which they use be permitted to be made as palatable looking as possible. And right in this connection I desire to direct the attention of this committee to the fact that the deceitful and designing schemers who are behind this measure first sought to strike down this industry by arousing the fears of the people against oleomargarine, charging it was deleterious to health; but the overwhelming testimony of chemist and physician drove them from this position, and now they attack from another quarter. I desire out of this great mass of testimony on this phase of the question—and there is no person who now disputes the proposition that oleomargarine is a healthful food product—to submit to you only a few statements of eminent men.

Prof. J. W. S. Arnold, professor of physiology in the University of New York, says:

I consider that each and every article employed in the manufacture of oleomargarine butter is perfectly pure and wholesome; that oleomargarine butter differs in no essential manner from butter made from cream. In fact, oleomargarine butter possesses the advantage over natural butter of not decomposing so readily, as it contains fewer volatile fats. In my opinion oleomargarine is to be considered a great discovery, a blessing for the poor, and in every way a perfectly pure, wholesome, and palatable article of food.

Prof. W. O. Atwater, director of the United States Government Agricultural Experiment Station at Washington, says:

It contains essentially the same ingredients as natural butter from cow's milk. It is perfectly wholesome and healthy and has a high nutritious value.

Prof. Henry E. Alvord, formerly of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, and president of the Maryland College of Agriculture, and now chief of the Dairy Division of the United States Department of Agriculture, and one of the best butter makers in the country, says:

The great bulk of butterine and its kindred products is as wholesome, cleaner, and in many respects better, than the low grades of butter of which so much reaches the market.

Prof. Paul Schweitzer, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry, Missouri State University, says:

As a result of my examination, made both with the microscope and the delicate chemical tests applicable to such cases, I pronounce butterine to be wholly and unequivocally free from any deleterious or in the least objectionable substances. Carefully made physiological experiments reveal no difference whatever in the palatability and digestibility between butterine and butter.

Professor Wiley, chief of the Division of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, appeared before the committee and testified to the nutritive and wholesome qualities of oleomargarine.

The Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate, in a report dated February 28, 1900, finds, from the evidence before it, "that the product known commercially as oleomargarine is healthful and nutritious."

Dr. George M. Kober, professor of hygiene, Georgetown University, District of Columbia, says:

As a teacher of hygiene, I have urged upon my students for years to bring the merits and nutritive value of this food stuff to the attention of the public, and in the interest of the wage-earners of this country to correct, as far as possible, the prejudice which has been created against the use of this product, provided always it is sold under its true name and at its real value. In this opinion I am glad to be supported by the highest scientific authorities in this country and abroad.

As a matter of fact the services of an expert chemist must be utilized in order to distinguish between good oleomargarine and butter made at high-grade creameries.

But to return, where does the demand come from for this legislation? It does not come from the creameries making high-grade butter. They sell their product, all of it, at a much higher price, and in no sense come into competition with oleomargarine, and are not demanding this legislation. Then who does demand it? It comes from the persons who are making the inferior article of butter and are unable to compete with the manufacturers of this wholesome product, and here in Washington they are represented by "The National Dairy Union." They originated this bill. They brought it here. They demand its passage. And since it has been here it has been nursed by the most insolent and shameless lobby which ever infested this Capitol. They have not only obtruded themselves into the committee room where this measure was being considered, bringing pressure to bear on members of the Committee on Agriculture having the measure in charge, but they invaded the district of the chairman of that committee during the last election and endeavored to encompass his defeat.

When they had failed there, it was openly charged in the press of the country that pressure was to be brought to bear on the gentleman who was to be elected to the exalted position of Speaker of the House of Representatives, to have him displace the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] as chairman of said committee, and for what reason, pray? Because he had the manhood and the courage to follow the dictates of his conscience and judgment in the discharge of his official duty and oppose this iniquitous measure.

Now, what is to be the effect of this bill if it becomes a law? The president, vice-president, and secretary of the Dairy Union say, in effect, that it will drive the manufacturers of oleomargarine out of business.

The taxation carried by the provisions of this bill will prove repressive. We all know that one of the immediate effects of same will be to depreciate the value of all products entering into the composition of oleomargarine. This tax of 10 cents a pound will drive yellow oleomargarine from the markets, and, of course, will enable the makers of low-grade butter to sell their product for a higher price. The principal products of my State, cotton and cattle, and the products of our 156 cotton-seed-oil mills will depreciate in value by virtue of the effect of this indirect tax placed on them.

It can not be denied that ultimately the full weight of the burden of this legislation will rest on those who cultivate cotton, grow cattle, and manufacture cotton-seed oil. Some estimate that the depreciation will reach millions of dollars. Now, gentlemen, will you lend yourselves to the accomplishment of this selfish end? Will you assent to this flagrant prostitution of the taxing power? Permit me to read what one of the greatest lawyers and judges that ever sat on the Supreme Bench said on this subject, having in mind, I doubt not, just such legislation as is here proposed. In Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., p. 664) the court said:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

The language used by the court is strong, but not too strong for legislation of this character. But to continue, who is to be affected by this measure? The manufacturers of oleomargarine, the manufacturers of cotton-seed oil, the cotton growers, the cattlemen, and the great mass of laboring people who consume this healthful product. In the interest of the dairymen you are to lay a heavier burden on the poor by requiring them to pay a higher price for low-grade butter, which they prefer not to buy. The rich are not affected because, as I have shown, the creameries making the high-grade butter they use do not come in competition with oleomargarine and are not asking this legislation.

Now, gentlemen, will you yield to this selfish demand and permit the taxing power to be used to crush one industry, depreciate the value of many agricultural products, place additional burdens on the poorer classes in order that one other product may be sold for a higher price? You have the votes and can pass this bill if you desire, but, gentlemen, this legislation is unrighteously wrong in principle and mean in spirit. If you do pass it my State will survive, notwithstanding it will lose millions of dollars, occasioned by depreciation of the value of our cotton, cattle, and cotton-seed oil, but it will not be the first time the industries and resources of the Democratic South have been plundered by means of class legislation in order to protect and build up the industries of Republican North. It may not be politic to say it, but I verily believe that if the dairy interest could shift sections with the cattle and cotton interests this legislation would make but slow progress.

Mr. Chairman, I fear nothing that can be said will prevent the passage of this bill. But one more thought I desire to suggest. Texas is a growing State. The time will surely come when she will have many times over the Representatives on this floor than those representing the State from which this bill comes. If at that distant period the party now dominant in Texas should be succeeded here by members of the party believing in special legislation, who may not be restrained by the proper sense of right and justice, the industries of that State whose Representatives now vote to destroy our leading manufacturing industry may be crushed out of existence to serve some local interest in Texas. I would not sanction such action, but this precedent may justify it.

We may view this matter from different standpoints; it seems to me, gentlemen—and I say it in all gentleness and kindness—if you vote for this bill you simply aid your dairyman (by force of legislation) to push his hand into the pocket of our cotton grower and cattle grower and cotton-seed-oil manufacturer and steal a certain per cent of the value of their products. You may try to salve your conscience, or attempt to salve it, by confessing in private that you know it is wrong and that the fault lies with your selfish and dishonest constituency. I beg to let you know, however, that this will not establish you in the respect of the person to whom you confess, but only makes known to him that you have the intelligence to recognize the evil and wrong of this legislation, but are too cowardly to do right and combat it.

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I know that nothing can be said on this floor that is going to change the result. I believe that if every member who casts his vote upon this measure were brought face to face with his God and were controlled by his best judgment and conscience, the bill would not receive more than 25 per cent of the votes that it will receive, and the votes for it would be cast because of the ignorance of the persons casting them.

I know that you are going to enact this measure. I fear that the melodious voice of the gentle milch cow is ringing in your ears, and visions of her selfish owner with his vote are passing across your brain. I apprehend that you are going to be controlled by your fears rather than by your conscience. I regret it.

A few timid Democrats will doubtless vote for this measure; and I say in all candor that I derive a degree of satisfaction in knowing that but few members of this side can be influenced by any such selfish demands to cast their ballots for the benefit of any special class. I say "a few timid Democrats"—timid and misguided—will vote for this measure. But I implore you, if you purpose to adopt Republican methods and permit policy, narrow selfish policy, to control you rather than be guided by the broad Democratic principle of opposition to all such pernicious class legislation, then vote for this Tawney-Knight-Grout-McCleary bill, but for God's sake do not disquiet the father of Democracy in his grave by longer calling yourselves Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This measure is protectionism run mad.

Now, gentlemen, in behalf of the cotton producers of the South, in behalf of the cattle growers of the South and Southwest, speaking for the cotton-seed oil manufacturers of Texas, I protest against this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the eloquent gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] while he was referring to the fact that we were particularly tender about the feelings of the owner of the milch cow, I could not help but reflect that he was thinking with equal solicitude about the feelings of the owner of the Texas steer, and that his sentiments were no higher or nobler than were the sentiments of those who have among their constituents a few farmers engaged in the honest occupation of manufacturing butter.

When the gentleman from Texas referred to the fact that the present Henry bill, while it is a species of taxation, is not in fact principally a revenue measure, and therefore is a fraud, I could not help but contrast with the bill of the majority the proposition which is made by the minority of the committee, who seek to have their bill passed as a substitute, and as a species of taxation the same as is the Henry bill, and a revenue measure upon its face and subject to the same criticism as is the Henry bill in that regard. The fact is this committee had before it two propositions—one submitted by the majority of the Committee on Agriculture and the other submitted by the minority of that committee. In some respects those two bills are alike.

Both are revenue measures. Neither the Wadsworth bill nor the Henry bill seeks to obtain revenue as its principal object; but the object of the Wadsworth bill and the object of the Henry bill are exactly the same—to regulate the sale and use of oleomargarine and prevent fraud. When the gentleman from Alabama propounded to the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Connecticut, an inquiry as to the objects of this measure, I could not help but feel that the same reply could be made logically by the gentleman from Connecticut as would be made by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York—that the object of both measures is the same, to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine.

Now, as to the excuse for this legislation. There is absolutely abounding testimony in favor of some drastic legislation to prevent the almost universal fraud which has prevailed in the sale of oleomargarine. The personal experience of every member of this Congress must establish the fact of their own knowledge that most of the oleomargarine that is sold in the United States is sold under the pretense that it is butter and is thought to be butter by the purchaser. Even those who came before the committee to defend the industry and to object to the Grout bill, or any bill made upon that form, acknowledged that there is a large amount of fraud, reluctantly conceding that the fraud, perhaps, extends to from 15 to 25 per cent of the entire sale of oleomargarine.

On the other hand, it was contended by Governor Hoard and another gentleman who spoke upon the same line that 90 per cent or more of the entire sale of oleomargarine in this country is sold fraudulently. The proportion of oleomargarine to butter manufactured and sold in the United States is as 1 to 8. The number of people interested in the manufacture of butter is not confined to those who have their money invested in large dairies, but almost every farmer's family in the State of Illinois is to a larger or less extent interested in the manufacture and sale of butter. Now, the object of this bill—at least that is my object in supporting it—is to prevent fraud and to enable manufacturers of oleomargarine to sell it only for exactly what it is.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does not my colleague think that our legislature in the State of Illinois could enforce laws for the prevention of the fraudulent sale of food products within our State?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir; I suppose they could.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does not the gentleman think that our legislature is capable of passing and our governor capable of enforcing such laws?

Mr. GRAFF. I do know that while there has been evidence of an almost overwhelming sentiment in the United States in favor of restrictive State legislation there has been a great deal of difficulty in preventing fraud through the medium of State enactments in some 32 of the entire States of the Union.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What you specially denounce as a fraud on the part of the manufacturers of oleomargarine is the use of coloring matter, I believe, is it not?

Mr. GRAFF. What I object to——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is not that true?

Mr. GRAFF. What I object to is that they make oleomargarine look like butter. Whether that coloration is brought about by what is known as coloring matter or whether it is brought about by an ingredient which is put into the article in its manufacture, makes no difference as to the deception which is practiced upon the purchaser.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman support an amendment to the bill which will forbid the use of this artificial coloring matter by the manufacturers of butter as well as by the manufacturers of oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. I have no objection to that——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will you vote for it?

Mr. GRAFF. But I do not think it would be a proper amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will you support an amendment which will deny to the butter manufacturer the privilege of practicing this "fraud" which you so severely condemn when resorted to by the manufacturers of an equally wholesome food.

Mr. GRAFF. The manufacturers of butter do not put the coloring matter in it to make it look like oleomargarine, but the manufacturers of oleomargarine put coloring in that article to make it look like some other article.

Mr. SLAYDEN. To make it look like fraudulent butter, perhaps?

Mr. GRAFF. Not at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the object of the butter maker in putting coloring matter into the product is to make it look like something that it was not when it came out of the churn.

Mr. CLAYTON. In other words, fraudulent butter is all right——

Mr. SLAYDEN. But fraudulent oleomargarine is all wrong.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to say that I put coloring matter in my butter so I can get 4 or 5 cents more a pound for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. Regarding this matter of color——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I should like to see the gentleman draw the color line right now.

Mr. GRAFF. You gentlemen from the South ought not to object to drawing the color line.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We do not. We do it distinctly.

Mr. GRAFF. I am in perfect good humor about this bill, gentlemen. It does not agitate me a bit when gentlemen get wrought up over it. It is going to pass.

I want to say further that there has actually been some criticism about the fact that the origin of this legislation is found among the people. That is one of the principal objections which my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] makes to this bill. He claims that it did not have its origin here in Congress, but that it was brought about by agitation among the farmers of the country. I do not consider that a very forceable argument against the passage of this bill. It is a new thing to me if the fact that a piece of legislation speaks or voices the sentiments of some four or five millions of our people engaged in a legitimate industry is a proper objection to it.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman please state what the position of the labor organizations is—the workingmen who live in the large cities—with regard to this bill, and as to whether their wishes should not be consulted as well as those of the farmers? There are other people in the United States besides the farmer whose interests ought to be looked after.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, and there is nobody who appreciates that so well as the man who represents an exclusively city district. There is no concealment about the fact, gentlemen, that no doubt some of our votes upon this measure will be governed by the color of opinion which prevails among our constituents. But I think that influence is just as potent on one side of this question as it is on the other.

I must confess that when I receive a petition addressed to my committee, signed by 150 of the agricultural newspapers of the United States, coming from 20 different States, that it has some effect upon my judgment and opinion in this matter, and it seems to me that it is perfectly legitimate and proper to consider the opinion of these 150 newspapers, speaking, as we may naturally suppose, the general judgment of the thousands of subscribers who sustain those papers.

Now, the Ways and Means Committee, having jurisdiction of most of the bills which come to this House for the purpose of raising revenue, have hearings which are attended by the representatives of the manufacturers of the great cities, asking that their interests be considered in framing the tariff laws and the internal-revenue legislation of the country. If it is proper for them to spend time, which, by the way, they are spending now in hearing the various interests of the country, which have a very large advantage over the scattered farmer, with his population spread all over the different States of this Union, able to have their interests contemplated and represented, the condition of affairs to which no one thinks of objecting—in fact, the right of petition to Congress is one of the constitutional privileges.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that the Ways and Means Committee, beginning shortly after the holidays, have devoted all their time to hearing agriculturists of the United States, to the exclusion of everybody else, on the subject of their interests?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; and I am glad to have the gentleman from Ohio mention that fact. But I presume that the Committee on Ways and Means do not propose to close their hearings, after having heard from the agricultural interests, without hearing also from the manufacturing, banking, and mercantile interests, and from all of the industrial interests of the country, and properly so. It is not often that the farmers of the country express themselves as unitedly as they have done upon this measure, and the fact that they have spoken so unitedly and forcibly is not an argument against this bill. It is not a proper subject for insinuation, but is a legitimate reason why we should at least give it very careful consideration before we oppose it.

Now, I am free to say that if I thought the Wadsworth bill would effectually stamp out this fraud, which is acknowledged to be so general, in the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine, I would vote for the Wadsworth bill. Not because it is any less objectionable in not being a revenue measure, because it is. I do object to the Wadsworth bill because there is nothing to prevent the removal of the stamp which is wrapped around the package, on the cover, and mixing it up with butter, or mixing it together and putting it into a separate firkin and selling it as butter, just as it is now sold.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if the same revenue laws, which so effectually control the retail dealers in tobacco and liquors as to prevent the commission of a violation of the internal-revenue laws, would not be operative and equally effective on the manufacturers and dealers in oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not think so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why not?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not think so, because all species of tobacco are included under the internal-revenue taxation and subject to tax, and there is no article made that is passed for tobacco, and sold. When they go to the counter and ask for tobacco. tobacco is handed out to them. The gentleman knows that nobody sitting at a table asks his neighbor to pass the oleomargarine. Now, an effort is made to get out of the well-acknowledged fact that people go and ask for butter and receive oleomargarine, and the reason given by those who oppose this measure is that the poor man, out of pride, asks for butter when he wants oleomargarine.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman knows perfectly well, I think——

Mr. GRAFF (continuing). That is the weakest proposition and reason that I have ever heard furnished on this floor.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am merely discussing whether the revenue laws equally are effective and operative; and the people of the country, so far as I know, have respect for those laws and do not violate them, and they would respect this law equally well.

Mr. GRAFF. Here we find this question, I will say in reply to the gentleman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Why do not they respect the existing law?

Mr. SLAYDEN. They do in my section of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will ask the gentleman what is there in the Henry bill to prevent the same frauds that you complain can be perpetrated under the minority bill?

Mr. GRAFF. Because the Grout-Henry bill permits the sale of uncolored oleomargarine with a trifling tax upon it. If it is true that the poor man asks for butter because he is proud, under this bill he can call for what he wants, and if he desires oleomargarine he then can buy it at the proper price.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That does not prevent fraud, for the retail dealer can take it home and sell it for butter, as he can under the present law.

Mr. GRAFF. Under the present law he asks for colored. Now, in the sale of oleomargarine the thing that causes a tremendous lot of fraud is the cost per pound of oleomargarine as compared with the cost per pound of butter, because the dealer is able to palm it off for butter, as it looks like butter, and make a tremendous profit, out of all proportion to the profit on the butter he would sell, and yet he can sell the article for less than real butter could be sold for.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state what difference they would have to pay?

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota to make that statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. The difference is that of 8 to 17 cents. Eight cents for oleomargarine and 17 cents for butter.

Mr. GRAFF. The difference is between 8 cents for oleomargarine and 17 cents for butter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman has not yet answered my question—in what way the Grout-Henry bill will prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine for butter any more than the minority bill. It goes into the hands of the retail dealer, and he can color it, just as he does now, if he wants to.

Mr. GRAFF. There is no law that can not be violated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right.

Mr. GRAFF. It simply depends upon the proportionate strength of the two bills as presented.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is it exactly.

Mr. GRAFF. Whether under one or the other there will be greater or less frauds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is it.

Mr. GRAFF. In the hearings before our committee we had before us men connected with the dairy interests, farmers, dairymen, scientific men, manufacturers of oleomargarine, and it was apparent that the solution of this question was by no means an easy one. This thing was clear—that under the present law it was practically a dead letter, because the oleomargarine manufacturer relied for his sale of oleomargarine upon the ability of the retail dealer to palm it off upon the public for butter.

Now, then, I believe that under this measure, when the tax on the white oleomargarine is reduced to one-quarter of a cent per pound, that it will give the oleomargarine dealers an opportunity to create a market for their own product on its own merits.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it from what the gentleman says that he does not think there is any fraud in the sale of the uncolored oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. When it is sold uncolored I do not think there is any fraud in it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe, then, that the man who sells it at retail, where he can not sell more than 10 pounds to a person, ought to be obliged to pay a license of $48 a year?

Mr. GRAFF. I will reply to that. The gentleman from Illinois asked the gentleman from Connecticut that question. We had before our committee that very question as to whether we might not just as well knock off the slight tax of $48 per year upon the retail dealers. The reason why we retained the tax was not because of the fact alone that we desired to impose a tax upon the retail dealer in uncolored oleomargarine, but it was for the same reason that we retained the one-quarter of a cent tax on the uncolored oleomargarine—for the purpose of tracing the fraudulent sale of colored oleomargarine and to secure the regulation of the sale, so that we might discriminate between the sale of the colored and uncolored, especially as the members of the committee who went out to an oleomargarine factory near the limits of the city discovered a thing which had not been discovered in the prior hearings during the past session.

It has been contended that in order to color the white oleomargarine to look like butter it was necessary for the manufacturer to put that oleomargarine under a great degree of heat, and that it required a considerable of a process to mix any coloring matter so that it would be a successful coloring. But, lo and behold, the members of the Agricultural Committee, those in favor of the measure and those against it, went out to witness the coloring of a small portion of white oleomargarine, saw it colored in a few minutes, without very much difficulty, and without any heating process whatever. That led us to see that here was a method of fraud which had been opened up to us, a new discovery which the innocent manufacturer and the innocent dealer in oleomargarine would not fail to take advantage of when the information reached them. So it was necessary for us, therefore, to have some regulation upon the people who sold uncolored oleomargarine, as well as those who sold it in a colored state originally.

Now, then, a good deal of sentiment has been wasted on the manufacturers of oleomargarine. I have not the slightest thing against them in the manufacture of oleomargarine itself. It is as legitimate a manufacture as the manufacture of butter, but are any of us so simple that we think that the manufacturer of oleomargarine is unconscious of the medium through which he finds a sale for his product? Is he unconscious of the fact that a large per cent of his product which he is manufacturing is being sold, behind large signs for butter and so-called dairies and all that sort of thing, to the great majority of the people who obtain his product from the retail dealers, and obtain it in answer to a request for butter?

Well, if we needed any further proof here are the letters and circulars, copies of which were before our hearings, showing a disposition and an assurance on the part of these manufacturers of oleomargarine to the retail dealers that they propose to protect them.

Mr. EDDY. Will the gentleman allow me a question at this point?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. EDDY. Is there anything in the Wadsworth bill, while it may protect the purchaser and every man purchasing oleomargarine from the dealer, will it protect them from palming it off onto the consumer as actual butter?

Mr. GRAFF. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. What is there to prevent his palming off the colored oleomargarine after he has paid the 10 per cent tax?

Mr. GRAFF. There is a provision in the bill——

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I ask him what is to prevent him from putting it off as butter after he has paid the 10 per cent tax?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, well, if he has paid the 10 cents a pound, then he has paid dearly for his fraud. There was something that came to the committee beside the new process of colored oleomargerine. Many members of the committee could not see the necessity of keeping any tax at all on uncolored oleomargarine. I had absolutely no prejudice, and have now no prejudice, against selling oleomargarine for what it is.

But it soon developed that a large portion of the trade of the manufacturers of oleomargarine comprised the hotel keepers and the restaurant keepers, and so in order to establish a guard in that direction we placed in the bill this provision:

And any person that sells, vends, or furnishes oleomargarine for the use and consumption of others, except to his own family and guests thereof without compensation, who shall add to or mix with such oleomargarine any ingredient or coloration that causes it to look like butter, shall also be held to be a manufacturer of oleomargarine within the meaning of said act and subject to the provisions thereof.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is to say, if the manufacturer takes 99 per cent of butter and mixes with it 1 per cent of oleomargarine he comes within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GRAFF. If anybody is foolish enough to do anything of that kind he ought to come within the provisions of some law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The question is not as to foolishness. Is not the effect of the provision what I state?

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me say——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not asking the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that. But permit me to say that in order to come within the law he will have to manufacture that which is defined in the existing law as oleomargarine.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This defines it.

Mr. TAWNEY. No, it does not.

Mr. GRAFF. The definition in the first section of this bill applies only to interstate commerce.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That does not answer my question at all. What I say is that the person who takes 1 per cent of oleomargarine and mingles it with 99 per cent of butter is a manufacturer under that section of your bill.

Mr. GRAFF. No, sir; the language is—

Shall add to or mix with such oleomargarine any ingredient or coloration that causes it to look like butter shall also be held to be a manufacturer of oleomargarine within the meaning of said act and subject to the provisions thereof——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not care whether he is going to sell it or not.

Mr. GRAFF. That is what the bill says.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If he mixes 99 per cent of butter with 1 per cent of oleomargarine he comes within the provision of the bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Does not the gentleman think that a man who fraudulently mixes oleomargarine with butter and then sells the product as butter ought to be amenable to some law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly I do.

Mr. GRAFF. That is exactly what this bill does.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am talking about the talent that produced this measure.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, I am much obliged to the gentleman for his high opinion of the framers of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When a man mixes 1 per cent of oleomargarine with 99 per cent of butter, he becomes under this bill a manufacturer of oleomargarine, and is obliged to pay tax as such.

Mr. GRAFF. If he makes it look like butter and undertakes to sell it as such, yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course it would look like butter if it was butter.

Mr. GRAFF. I think the gentleman's construction is correct, and that such ought to be the law.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question for information. I see by the testimony that 95 per cent of the commercial butter—of the butter entering into commerce—is colored. I do not see that statement seriously disputed; and presumably a very much larger proportion of the uncommercial butter is colored. Now, if that is so, is it the effect of this bill to make oleomargarine look more or less like natural butter, much of which, as the testimony shows, is white?

Mr. GRAFF. The opinion of the gentlemen who appeared before our committee was that all butter had some shade of yellow in it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Artificial yellow.

Mr. GRAFF. Some shade of yellow. I do not know what the gentleman means by "artificial yellow." There is only one kind of yellow in this country, although there are several shades. There is no such thing as "artificial yellow." But when you come down to the bottom of the argument about the color of butter, you must admit that there is a certain color that has come down with the ages as a butter color. There must be some definition; there must be some test as to what butter is, and the best test of fraud is by the evidence of the eye.

Why, sir, men upon our committee who are opposed to this legislation wanted us to confine the provisions of the bill to color—did not want the matter of texture to be a violation of the law—did not think it a violation of the law. But there being a necessity for some method of determining which is spurious butter and which the real—which the imitation and which the genuine—the color was evidently the only test fair to the oleomargarine manufacturers that we could fix upon, for this reason, that all oleomargarine has the texture of butter.

Now, if these gentlemen who are really in earnest about the question of colored butter will formulate a bill for the purpose of regulating the color of butter, and if it is a bill which commends itself to this House, it will no doubt pass. I believe in reasonable food legislation, and I believe the day will come when every purchaser will be able to protect himself in knowing the ingredients of the food product that he purchases. The subject before us being a very difficult one to deal with, the committee, after listening to all the arguments, retained all the important features of the Grout law, while they guarded the measure and improved it by amendment.

Mr. LESSLER. I should like to ask the gentleman how much weight was given by the committee to the opinions of the consumer—the man who buys 15, 18, or 20 cent butter—whether pure butter or good oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. Well, we tried to represent the consumers. All of us are consumers of butter. Even the men who are supporting legislation that favors oleomargarine are consumers of butter.

I presume that, if we are candid, most of us are consumers of butter, even the representative of the Texas steer. He is a consumer of butter when he can be. And we, of the committee, could not help thinking that the workmen of this country at this time are almost forced to pay butter prices for oleomargarine. The appearance of butter is a thing which belongs originally to butter, is associated in the mind of the consumer with butter, and there is no question that the reason why the manufacturers of oleomargarine desire to color oleomargarine yellow is to satisfy that taste and desire for butter which exists in the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why do the butter makers color their butter?

Mr. GRAFF. The reason the butter makers color butter is because of the fact that in the summer season, when the grass is green, the natural color of butter is yellow; that is when it is supposed that the strength and the ingredients of the milk will make the very best butter. Now, for the purpose of uniformity——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, it is a question of uniformity?

Mr. GRAFF. For the purpose of uniformity the butter makers have colored their butter yellow in imitation of summer butter.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is there any evidence before your committee that butter is ever colored to resemble anything except butter?

Mr. GRAFF. No; you never have it colored white to resemble lard.

Mr. TAWNEY. And oleomargarine is always colored for the purpose of making it resemble that which it is not.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. LESSLER. I think you did not quite answer the question I put to you.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman refer to petitions from labor organizations?

Mr. LESSLER. I do not know anything about that. I know that I have a great number of poor people in my district, for instance.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. LESSLER. People who can not afford to pay the 30 cents they would be required to pay to obtain a pound of butter in that district, and who buy this 15, 18, or 20 cent product—whether they think it is oleomargarine or butter I do not know—but I know they want that, and they buy it. Now, I want to know from you, Have you considered that when you add 10 cents to the price of that product they will not be able to buy anything?

Mr. GRAFF. We do not do any such thing. We take off 1¼ cents per pound. The present tax is 2 cents per pound on oleomargarine. The tax is reduced by this bill to one-quarter of a cent per pound when it is allowed to retain the natural color of oleomargarine. The workingmen in your city can go there and buy that oleomargarine, or they ought to, for less per pound than they pay now, for two reasons: First, because the tax will be less than it is now, and secondly, because almost universally the oleomargarine manufacturer makes his product to fill a demand for butter and not for oleomargarine.

Mr. LESSLER. But he will have to buy it white when he wants it yellow.

Mr. TAWNEY. He can color it himself if he wants to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman believe that if this bill should be passed and approved by the President and enforced in the United States, that it would very largely increase the cost of butter?

Mr. GRAFF. No; I do not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then you do not believe it is of any benefit to the manufacture of butter?

Mr. GRAFF. It might stimulate somewhat the manufacture of butter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Stimulate it?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How do you stimulate the manufacture of any product?

Mr. GRAFF. It might increase the demand. It might raise the price somewhat. It would not raise the price anything approximating 10 cents per pound. It would simply cause the farmers of the country to keep more cows than they do now, some of them not finding it profitable to make butter at the present time, and there would be a larger amount of butter made by the farmers than at the present time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What would induce that?

Mr. GRAFF. It would no doubt affect somewhat the price of butter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Somewhat!

Mr. GRAFF. But it would not raise the price of butter beyond reason, and it would not raise it in any such degree as has been predicted by some of the gentlemen upon the other side of this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In this city to-day good oleomargarine, as I have been told, is for sale at about 15 cents, or perhaps 18 cents per pound at the highest, while what is claimed to be pure butter is sold for 35 cents, or double the price of the oleomargarine. Now, if, as according to the testimony here you will do, you prohibit and break up the manufacture of oleomargarine altogether, do not you think it will enable the farmer to put the price of butter up to 40 or 45 cents a pound?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why not?

Mr. GRAFF. When you come to consider, in the first place, that we have already restrictive legislation in 32 States of the Union, which will continue to exist regardless of the failure or success of this bill, which legislation no doubt interferes with the sale of oleomargarine at the present time. In addition to that, you must remember that oleomargarine is only one-eighth of the amount consumed in the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I differ very greatly with the gentleman as to the proportionate amount; but, as I understand it, the gentleman's idea is that all this outcry from the butter manufacturers is not based upon any hope of pecuniary benefit, but is purely a platonic purpose in a missionary spirit to purify commercial intercourse between our people.

Mr. GRAFF. I presume it is based upon self-interest. It is also based on a very justifiable objection to the fraudulent sale of an article in competition with their own honest product, and selling it for their own honest product when it is not. If the oleomargarine people have a healthful article, and I think it probably is, they ought to cultivate a taste for oleomargarine and create a market for it upon its own merits.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, they are doing that.

Mr. GRAFF. Let them break down the prejudice in favor of butter if they can; and the best way for them to do that is to get the people of the United States to eat white oleomargarine, and if it is more healthful than butter, if it is more pleasant to the taste than butter, if it is better than butter, and cheaper than butter, then we will have more oleomargarine sold under this measure than there will be of butter sold, and it ought to be so.

Mr. EDDY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. EDDY. There seems to be a good deal of solicitude manifested here as to the interests of the laboring people and the poor people. I would like to ask whether there was before your committee any clamorous demand on the part of laboring classes for colored oleomargarine at twice the price of the uncolored?

Mr. GRAFF. No, sir; and in all my experience, to the present time, I have never heard anybody ask for oleomargarine; but in all my travels I have heard a good many inquiries for butter.

Mr. SOUTHARD. As I understand it, under this bill it would be permissible for the manufacturer of oleomargarine to use white butter, but not colored butter.

Mr. GRAFF. He would be able to use any kind of butter, provided that in the use of that ingredient, of that butter, or anything else, he did not color his oleomargarine so as to look like butter.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That is the distinction, I understand, that he could use white butter but can not use June butter.

Mr. GRAFF. It is contended that there is no such thing as pure white butter, for butter always has some tint of yellow, and it is a technical fact that where any shade of yellow is found that it is yellow.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman remembers that there were samples brought before the committee, including butter and oleomargarine, so nearly alike in tint that the difference could not be detected. I should like to ask him the question if under the majority bill it would punish as a fraud the sale of uncolored oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. I remember that. I am glad the gentleman spoke about it. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAHLE] made some butter in his room, and it was about as white as butter can be. I am making a large admission in that. We had some white oleomargarine, and they were brought up and put upon the committee table for the purpose of comparison, and when Judge Springer, the attorney for the oleomargarine factory here, was attempting to show that they were alike somebody asked him to put the white butter up against the little china mug that we had upon the table and he says, "Oh, no; don't do that."

Because when the white butter—white as it could be made, made under the most unfavorable circumstances and unusual circumstances in Mr. DAHLE'S room—was brought up there it did look white when laid beside our yellow scratch paper, which we had upon the committee-room table, but when it was placed against the white porcelain cup which they had upon the table it disclosed a shade of yellow. I think as a matter of fact all real butter has a shade of yellow.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. GRAFF. I was relating my opinion of what took place there.

Mr. SCOTT. My question was: Is there anything in the majority bill to prevent the fraudulent sale of uncolored oleomargarine for butter. Suppose that a customer comes in and asks for uncolored butter. I appeal to all the members of the committee to bear me out in the statement that in the samples we had of uncolored oleomargarine and butter the difference could not be detected.

Mr. GRAFF. I think it could. That is where I differ with you.

Mr. SCOTT. If the customer should ask for uncolored butter, what is there is this bill to prevent an unscrupulous dealer from selling him uncolored oleomargarine?

Mr. GRAFF. If it is not colored to make it look like butter it would not be a violation of the law, but if it is colored to look like butter it would be. There are different shades of butter, and the uncolored oleomargarine shows that the absolutely only distinction between the two products lies in the color; and legislation, and only legislation, will give to us a reasonable assurance of the enforcement of the law for the protection of the consumer in being able to buy what he asks for. The purpose is to have that legislation based upon color.

Mr. SCOTT. One more question. You said a moment ago that in your judgment it should be an object to reform men's taste so that they would wish to buy butter. Is not the purchaser of oleomargarine as much entitled to have his taste protected by having it of a yellow color as the purchaser of butter is entitled to have his taste met by having it yellow?

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman think there is any honest demand for that?

Mr. SCOTT. I do, indeed.

Mr. GRAFF. Does anybody come in and ask for oleomargarine, and not only oleomargarine, but colored oleomargarine?

Mr. SCOTT. I think undoubtedly there are millions of pounds of oleomargarine sold to people who come and ask for oleomargarine.

Mr. GRAFF. Undoubtedly there are many pounds sold, but not millions, chiefly by people who keep restaurants and hotels, who desire to resell, which they do by placing it on the tables of their guests.

Mr. SCOTT. Not chiefly. There is one dealer in my home town who told me he sold 1,200 pounds of oleomargarine a month to laboring men who preferred it because they could not afford to buy butter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He wants it colored.

Mr. GRAFF. I presume the taste would be the same in the colored that it would in the white.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; so the taste would be the same in the white butter as in the colored butter, but there is another taste of the colored besides that which people ask the right to be gratified in.

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman does not question the fact that there has been a general fraud in the sale of oleomargarine?

Mr. SCOTT. No, I do not question that fact, and I will go as far as the gentleman himself to prevent that fraud.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to say that there seems to be a mysterious connection between gentlemen who have a preponderance of stock interests in their districts and the manufacture of oleomargarine, and yet you would be surprised to see how slight that connection is.

Secretary Wilson, in his testimony before the last committee, was asked concerning the disastrous effect of the Grout bill upon the price of cattle, and his reply in regard to that matter is here in this report, and I will read it:

Have you inquired into the effect the passage of this bill will have upon the value of animals raised for food purposes, not for dairy purposes?

Secretary WILSON. Very carefully.

Senator ALLEN. What will be the effect of the passage of this bill on that class of animals?

Secretary WILSON. I tried to reason that in my short paper which I have read. There is a little oil furnished by cotton-seed people, and a little by the people who grow steers; but the old-fashioned steer that had lots of fat in him is not the steer that is used to-day. The young beef, under 2 years of age, put into the market and prepared for the shambles, is not an animal that produces much body or intestinal fat. That is the animal that is wanted to-day.

The old-fashioned steer that was 3½ years old before he got to market had a large amount of fat, running up in some cases to 150 and as high as 180 pounds.

Now, then, the tendency in the South, where they have destroyed the lands by perpetual cropping, and the tendency west of the Missouri, in the semidry belt, where they are destroying the grazing lands by injudicious overgrazing, is to take a greater interest in the dairy cow than in the steer, and in the case of settlers who want to raise families out west of the one hundredth meridian the interest grows every day on behalf of the dairy cow, and with regard to the production of steers east of the Missouri River on the farms, there is no comparison whatever. The small amount of cattle that commerce calls for in making oleomargarine is infinitesimal in value compared with the injury that the growth of this bogus industry will inflict upon legitimate agriculture that requires a dairy cow.

Now, this is not from a selfish organization in favor of the dairy interests, but it is from a practical farmer; not only a practical farmer, but a man learned along the lines of agriculture, interested in its greatest welfare, and no doubt, while he may be mistaken, he certainly is endeavoring to conserve the best interests of all the farmers of the country, and there has never been a single charge that he attempted in the administration of his department to act in favor of one section as against the other. This is his verdict: That the injury would be infinitesimal. And his opinion regarding the small amount of effect which this bill would have upon the price of steers raised for the market is fortified by the statement of ex-Governor Hoard, where he analyzes the effect and the amount per head which this legislation would bring about. He says:

How have the oleomagarine makers and vendors endeavored to shield themselves against the wrath of an outraged people? By the cowardly act of endeavoring to protect their disreputable traffic by placing between themselves and justice the man who raises the steer, the hog, and grows the cotton. They have lied to all these interests. In their resolutions and arguments intended to rouse the antagonism of the raiser of beef they have represented to the stockman, without condescending to details and proof, that the manufacture of oleomargarine in this country enhances the value of every steer from $2 to $4 per head. They have represented that the doing away with oleomargarine in the United States would cost the producers of hogs 20 cents per head. They have told the cotton-seed oil people that the very existence of their business depends upon the manufacture of oleomargarine colored in semblance of butter.

What are the facts?

Oleo oil is supposed to be made from the fat of the steer. It is worth from 8 to 9 cents a pound as a finished article. Right now it happens, on account of the shortage of corn, to be worth more. But this condition is exceptional. Last year 142,000,000 pounds were exported and some 28,000,000 pounds used in the oleomargarine made in this country. The 28,000,000 pounds used in this country, at 9 cents per pound, an extreme price then, would amount to $2,500,000 in round numbers.

There were, according to close estimates of the Agricultural Department, 5,000,000 head of cattle killed in the United States that year. Divide two and a half millions of dollars of fat among 5,000,000 head of cattle, and what do you have? Fifty cents' worth of oil per head—oil, mind you, the finished article, after the manufacturer has had his pay for pressing it out. Now, as tallow, this fat is worth two-thirds its value as oleo oil, or 30 cents a head, to be conservative. If this fat was used as tallow in soap (where it is in great demand), instead of as oleo oil, it would bring only 20 cents per head less; and, mind you, the 20 cents per head is further reduced when the manufacturer gets his pay for the pressing of the oil.

Now, there is one other matter to which I wish to allude before I close.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. Leaving aside for one moment the selfish interests the gentleman has referred to, has the committee considered the uniformity clause in the taxing clause of the Constitution, as to whether this would be in violation of it; that is, the tax of 10 cents more upon one part of the same commodity on account of its color, whether that comes within the uniformity taxing clause of the Constitution?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not think it does, because the Supreme Court has recognized our power to tax any article for the purpose of regulating commerce, and it is certainly very plain to us why the distinction between the colored and uncolored is made, and that is what we have been discussing. We have not been discussing anything about our power to do it or questioning it, except the wisdom of doing so in regard to its results.

Mr. BOUTELL. Just to get away from this particular commodity, which is so absorbing, and to illustrate the principle, does my colleague think Congress could pass a law taxing rye whisky and excluding corn whisky?

Mr. GRAFF. I do not see why Congress could not make a distinction between the two, and I will tell the gentleman why. I will give the gentleman an exact answer to his question. There is a tax on alcohol made out of corn and there is no tax on alcohol made out of wood. I think there ought to be, but there is not. It seems to me that ought to be a full answer.

Mr. BOUTELL. That does not seem to me to be quite parallel, but there is one other question. How was the amount of 10 cents per pound arrived at for this tax? Was there any special reason for that amount?

Mr. GRAFF. The reason why we made the greater tax on the colored oleomargarine was because we considered the colored was the state in which the product was fraudulently sold. The purpose is to reach out after the fraudulent sale.

Mr. BOUTELL. My colleague misapprehends my question. It is why 10 was fixed upon instead of 15, or 20. How was that figure arrived at?

Mr. GRAFF. I am not familiar enough with the history of the bill to answer that question, because the Grout bill had its origin prior to my interest in this legislation. I appeal to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY].

Mr. MCCLEARY. It seems to me that the reason for fixing 10 cents as the amount was that the cost of oleomargarine uncolored is about 8 cents, while the cost of butter is about 17; so that 10 cents just about covers the difference and laps over a little.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the gentleman think there is any lack of power on the part of Congress to make the tax 25 cents a pound if it chose to do so?

Mr. MCCLEARY. None whatever.

Mr. BOUTELL. Then I ask my colleague [Mr. GRAFF] this question: Supposing that the legislature of Illinois or the legislature of Texas should grant a charter to a company to manufacture and sell oleomargarine within the State, does the gentleman think that we as Representatives in the National Legislature could pass a taxing law which would put out of existence or out of business a corporation thus chartered by one of the States?

Mr. GRAFF. Similar instances to that exist right now. It has been decided that the exercise of the taxing power is not a license. For instance, the imposition of a tax upon a wholesale or retail dealer in liquors does not give him the power to sell liquor in a State except in pursuance of the laws of that State. It simply imposes a tax by the General Government and protects him as against the General Government. It is not in any sense a license.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MANN. I ask that the time of my colleague be extended.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Because of the number of gentlemen on this side desiring to take part in the debate, I am obliged to object.

Mr. GRAFF. I would like to occupy only about ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The situation is such on our side that I am obliged to insist on my objection. I shall be glad to give the gentleman time later.

Mr. GRAFF. I just wanted to advert to a single point, not occupying more than five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well, go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] a question. As it is customary on the Republican side to refer to the Democratic platform, I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is anything in that platform which warrants our voting for this bill?

Mr. GRAFF. I know of nothing except that in my district the Democrats have always claimed to be the great friends of the farmers. I do not know how the fact is in the gentleman's community.

Mr. SIMS. I am asking about the application of the Democratic platform to this question, not about the gentleman's district. Does the gentleman believe——

Mr. GRAFF. I shall have to ask the gentleman to excuse me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. GRAFF. During the discussion of this bill we found that there existed in the Dingley Act a provision for the inspection of books of manufacturers of oleomargarine. This was to be done under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. But, strange as it may seem, the lawmakers had neglected to provide any penalty, so that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was entirely helpless in the enforcement of those regulations.

Having had this difficulty disclosed to us in the hearings, we reenacted that provision of the McKinley Act, with the addition of a penalty clause, and this we consider a very important feature of the legislation, because it enables the Internal-Revenue Department to examine into the ingredients that enter into the manufacture of oleomargarine and the names and the residences of the parties to whom it is sold. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for thirty minutes.

[Mr. CLAYTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 9206, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BEIDLER, until further notice, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOLLIDAY, for eighteen days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, until February 10, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8759. An act to require cases of typhoid fever occurring in the District of Columbia to be reported to the health department of said District.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. BULL, the Committee on Accounts were given leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. HENRY of Connecticut (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting resolutions of American Chamber of Commerce at Manila—to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the militia returns of the several States for the year 1901—to the Committee on Militia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10530) to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 320); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SCHIRM, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7018) for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClelland, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 321); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. OTEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9280) for the relief of Hugh C. Preston, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 322); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1529) granting a pension to John G. Brower, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 323); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4084) granting a pension to Charles H. Wickham, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 324); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. APLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1808) granting an increase of pension to William M. Strope, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 325); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 199) granting an increase of pension to Nathaniel Eaton, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 326); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KLEBERG, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9220) granting an increase of pension to John S. Hunter, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 327); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3272) granting a pension to Israel P. Covey, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 328); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7907) granting an increase of pension to Alice M. Ballou, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 329); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. APLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2390) granting a pension to Nellie M. Emery, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 330); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2175) granting an increase of pension Kephart Wallace, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 331); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CROWLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8620) granting a pension to Thomas Hall, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 332); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6487) granting a pension to Kezia Washburn, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 333); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. APLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1094) granting an increase of pension to Henry Gifford Dunbar, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 334); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6515) granting an increase of pension to Carleton A. Trundy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 335); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar

Mr. RUMPLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6873) granting a pension to Sarah Maley, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 336); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2010) granting an increase of pension to Marcia M. Merritt, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 337); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CROWLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8306) granting an increase of pension to Thomas W. Robinson, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 338); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3769) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Terry, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 339); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLLIDAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 568) granting an increase of pension to Henry Fisher, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 340); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5218) granting an increase of pension to Joel Metz, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 341); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DARRAGH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4115) granting a pension to William Engas, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 342); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2389) granting a pension to John E. Farrell, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 343); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KLEBERG, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7432) granting a pension to Charles A. Sheafe, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 344); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CROWLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3747) granting an increase of pension to William R. Underwood, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 345); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3412) granting an increase of pension to William H. Pierce, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 346); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUMPLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1622) granting a pension to Theophilus Goodwin, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 347); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DARRAGH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5521) granting a pension to Abbie Webster, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 348); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUMPLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4488) granting an increase of pension to Selden E. Whitcher, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 349); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 4, 1902.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

SENATOR FROM NEW JERSEY.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Mr. John F. Dryden, chosen by the legislature of New Jersey a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William J. Sewell, in the term ending March 3, 1907.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

The credentials were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the Senator-elect, who is now present, may be sworn in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect will please present himself at the desk, and the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. Dryden was escorted by Mr. KEAN to the Vice-President's desk; and, the oath of office having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS, MONTANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and accompanying bill providing an appropriation for the purchase of stock cattle for the Northern Cheyenne Indians of the Tongue River Agency, Mont., and also for the construction of a wire fence around a portion of their reservation; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a list of judgments rendered in favor of claimants in Indian depredation cases since January 24, 1902; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for "preservation and repair of fortifications" for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, $3,000; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICUS VS. WARR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Americus V. Warr, executor of James Warr, deceased, vs. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented petitions of Glass Bottle Blowers' Union No. 32, of Clyde; of United Garment Workers' Union No. 50, of Newburg, all of the American Federation of Labor, and of B. F. Middleton Post No. 500, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, of Brooklyn, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the construction of war vessels in the navy-yards of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange No. 540, Patrons of Husbandry, of Westville, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called Grout bill, to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of 37 post-office clerks of the Madison Square branch post-office, of New York City, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1345, to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second classes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 36, United Garment Workers of America, of Utica, N. Y., praying for the reenactment of the Chinese-exclusion law; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of the Central New York Chapter, American Institute of Architects, of Ithaca, N. Y., remonstrating against the proposed change in the title of the Architect of the Capitol; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of 26 citizens of Buffalo; of sundry citizens of Port Leyden, Lyons Falls, Turin, Constableville, Lowville, and Brooklyn, all in the State of New York, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented sundry affidavits in support of the bill (S. 3100) granting an increase of pension to Frank Beckman; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, of Colorado Springs, Colo., praying for the retention of the present tariff on sugar imported into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association, of Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, of Colorado Springs, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of a system of reservoirs throughout the arid West for the storage of its surplus waters to be used for general irrigation purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. HOAR. I present a number of petitions from sundry citizens of the United States, many of them eminent men of letters and scholars, favoring the suspension of hostilities in the Philippine Islands, and asking that an opportunity be given for a discussion of the situation between the Government and the Filipino leaders.

The petition is compact, and it is exceedingly temperate in its style. While it alludes to some charges that have been made against the administration, civil and military, in the Philippine Islands, it alludes to them without any assumption in regard to their truth, but only hypothetically as things that are existing and that demand inquiry.

I ask unanimous consent that one copy of the petition be printed as a document, and that the signatures be also printed, many of the signatures being of persons known in literature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the petition presented by him touching matters relating to the Philippine Archipelago be printed as a document.

Mr. HOAR. That the petition and signatures be printed, and that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 305) providing for a monument to mark the site of the Fort Phil Kearney massacre; and

A bill (S. 636) to remove the charge of desertion against David A. Lane.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 690) to correct the military record of Talton T. Davis, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8761) to declare the international railway bridge over the St. Lawrence River, near Hogansburg, N. Y., a lawful structure, to report it without amendment. I ask that it may take the place of Calendar No. 285, being the bill (S. 2714) to declare the international railway bridge over the southerly channel of the St. Lawrence River, near Hogansburg, N. Y., a lawful structure, which I reported from the Committee on Commerce a day or two ago. It is precisely the same bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas will be placed upon the Calendar and will take the place of Senate bill 2714, which will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2782) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1609) making an appropriation for the purchase from Forsyth County of a site and building for a post-office and other Government offices in Winston-Salem, N. C., and to authorize the sale of the present post-office site in Winston-Salem to Forsyth County, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

ZERELDA COBB.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 895) for the relief of Zerelda Cobb, so that the bill may be brought before the Senate and indefinitely postponed.

Zerelda Cobb was formerly Zerelda Likens, widow of Richard P. Likens, Company D, One hundred and twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteers. She was pensioned by certificate No. 56647, at $8 per month, from January 17, 1864, and was married to Cobb, September 4, 1873, who subsequently died. Under the law of March 3, 1901, which is copied in the rules of the Pensions Committee, this widow is provided for. I did not note it at the time I introduced the bill, or I would not have presented it and burdened the committee with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 895) for the relief of Zerelda Cobb. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

STATISTICS OF OLEOMARGARINE, ETC.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. PROCTOR on the 28th ultimo, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 copies of a compilation of Statistics of Oleomargarine, Oleo Oil, and Filled Cheese, revised to the beginning of the current fiscal year, compiled by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Department of Agriculture and 500 copies for the use of the Senate.

REPORT ON SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN REGION.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] on the 28th ultimo, providing for printing the report of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the forests, rivers, and mountains of the Southern Appalachain region, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 copies of Senate Document No. 84, being a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the forests, rivers, and mountains of the Southern Appalachian region, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 copies for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten," and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. 84, being a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the forests, rivers, and mountains of the Southern Appalachian region, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

A bill (S. 3501) granting a pension to Jennie Jones;

A bill (S. 3502) granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Ashton; and

A bill (S. 3503) granting a pension to Joseph L. Fell (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 3504) to provide an American register for the steamer Brooklyn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced a bill (S. 3505) granting an increase of pension to Matthew B. Noel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3506) granting an increase of pension to Stanley M. Casper; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Montana introduced a bill (S. 3507) for the relief of certain owners of lands relinquished as being within forest reserves; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3508) granting an increase of pension to James M. Thomas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 3509) to transfer the county of Carroll from the northwestern division of the northern district of Georgia back to the northern district of Georgia of the United States district and circuit courts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3510) granting an increase of pension to James M. Markham; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill, I present the petition for increase of pension of James M. Markham, Company A, Second Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, verified by affidavits of W. S. Ellerman and E. E. Collins, together with his military record from the War Department. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3511) for the relief of Wynona A. Dixon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3512) concerning minimum punishment in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 3513) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Parkville, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 3514) granting an increase of pension to Leander Parmelee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 3515) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of George F. Harter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3516) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Gregg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 3517) to amend the law creating the district of the Teche, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3518) granting a pension to Nodine A. Turchin (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3519) granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Cummings (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3520) granting an increase of pension to Myron T. Herrick.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 3521) to enlarge the jurisdiction and powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 3522) to increase the pension of certain Mexican war pensioners to $12 per month; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 3523) for the relief of the trustees of the North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SIMMONS introduced a bill (S. 3524) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain Confederate muster rolls upon the request of the governor of any State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 49) increasing the membership of the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library, authorized by section 82 of the Revised Statutes, shall hereafter consist of 5 members of the Senate and 5 members of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MASON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 for improving the Wabash River bordering on Indiana and Illinois, between Vincennes and the mouth of said river, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MOUNTING OF MAPS.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the folding room of the Senate is hereby directed to mount with rollers and hangers all United States maps hereafter printed and placed to the credit of the members of the Senate.

MONOGRAPHS ON TRADE.

Mr. CULLOM. I submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing. It provides for the printing of a certain number of monographs of the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department. It is a long list, and I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing without being read in full.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed the number of copies hereinafter stated of the following monographs prepared by the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department:

One-fourth of the number designated in each case to be for the use of the Senate, one-half for the use of the House of Representatives, and one-fourth for the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department; said reprints to be separately bound in paper and, wherever practicable, printed from plates in possession of the Public Printer.

EMPLOYEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I sumbit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That one of the positions of messenger at the Maltby Building, paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum, authorized by Senate resolution of July 26, 1892, be, and it hereby is, abolished; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint in lieu thereof two laborers, at an annual salary of $720 each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that it be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Pending that, I should like to inquire if it is the purpose to withdraw any service from the Maltby Building? It is none too good now, and if it is proposed to take one messenger from there and appoint two laborers to serve elsewhere the resolution ought not to pass.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in lieu.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the appointment may be in lieu, but the service may be rendered elsewhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, Mr. President, I will state that the messengership that is proposed to be abolished is connected with a committee of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me make an inquiry. I did not know that messengers were assigned to buildings, but to committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are.

Mr. BAILEY. As the resolution assigned this messenger to the building, I suppose the service was intended to be rendered there.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee might have been stated instead of the building; but the committee to whom this messenger has been assigned is in the Maltby Building, and I presume that is why it was done.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest, then, it would be better to say the messenger assigned to the committee. I am a little sensitive about the matter. I walked up three flights of stairs all the summer time there because they had no sufficient service, or for some other reason.

Mr. SPOONER. May I inquire what committee it is?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I spoke inadvertently when I said the committee to whom this messenger is assigned is in the Maltby Building, and I will now correct the matter. The resolution was not written by myself, but it was written at the suggestion of a Senator who has a messenger assigned to his committee, and he is quite willing to take a laborer at $720 a year in lieu of that messenger. That would enable the Sergeant-at-Arms to appoint an additional laborer, whose services would be given to the Government. I can see no objection to an arrangement of that kind; but the fact is, as I now recall, that the committee that has the service of this messenger is not located in the Maltby Building, so that the objection which the Senator from Texas raises is not valid, if it does not take a messenger from the Maltby Building, which I feel quite sure is not to be done. However, Mr. President, I will withdraw the resolution for the present for further inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

SPECIAL POSTAL RATES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate what is the construction placed by his Department upon the existing law prescribing the postage for periodical publications like those published by churches, parishes, missionary and other associations, containing in part advertisements, in part general intelligence or miscellaneous articles, and in part items of news of special interest to the members of the particular organizations under whose authority they are published, giving either, as may be found convenient, a list of such publications in regard to which special rules have been made by the Department, or such examples as will illustr ate the position of the Department.

AGREEMENT WITH INDIANS OF ROSEBUD AGENCY, S. DAK.

Mr. GAMBLE. Senate Document No. 31, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon a certain agreement with Indians of the Rosebud Agency, S. Dak., was submitted December 9, 1901, and ordered to be printed and lie on the table. A bill is now pending in the Senate for the ratification of that treaty, and it is before the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move that that report be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BROSIUS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to announce to the Senate that on Friday, the 14th instant, at 4 o'clock, I shall call up the resolutions of the House of Representatives commemorative of my late colleague in the House, Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, and I shall then ask the Senate to suspend its business in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, yesterday morning I reported from the Committee on Appropriations the urgent deficiency appropriation bill and gave notice that, with the consent of the Senate, I would call it up this morning at the close of the routine morning business. The Senator from Massachusetts has had in the morning hour for several days an important bill in his charge before the Senate. He has come very near securing a vote upon it and believes now, as I believe, that he can probably obtain a vote upon that important bill this morning. So, under these considerations, I will not now move to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill, but will let the judicial bill run until, say, 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read a third time?

Mr. TELLER. What has become of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]?

Mr. HOAR. It was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] offered an amendment, which he withdrew. The amendment to which the Senator from Colorado refers was laid on the table by a vote.

Mr. TELLER. I must have been out of the Chamber at the time.

Mr. President, I want to say merely a word. I think it would have been better, on coming to the question of the revision of salaries, to have included some other salaries and not to have confined the increase to the judiciary, or if we did, I think certainly the Territorial judges ought to have had their salaries increased. I do not suppose it will be possible on this bill to do that now, but it ought to have been done before it was reported from the committee to the Senate.

I think another thing, Mr. President. If we are going to raise salaries, it will be well enough to look at the salaries of the members of the Cabinet. I do not myself see why a member of the Cabinet, who is called upon to do certain social duties which the judges are not, should not have a reasonable salary. Everyone will admit that $8,000 is not a sufficient salary. No man can afford to be a member of the Cabinet, however much the President may desire to have him there, unless he is a man of means. He can not live on $8,000 and discharge the duties that every Cabinet officer is expected to perform. I think there should be a revision of these salaries, and I am not prepared to vote for a piecemeal operation. Whenever some one will take this matter up and provide for the real necessary increases I am willing to vote for it. I think the judges are as well paid as most of the officials of the Government of the United States.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after the word "Columbia," in line 22, at the end of the bill, insert:

That the members of the Cabinet shall each be paid the sum of $12,500 a year.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the amendment on the table. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is laid on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. On the passage of the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; on the amendment to increase the salaries of Cabinet officers. I do not see why we should be giving additional pay to the judges, who work, say, only six months a year, while a Cabinet officer is in his place every month. I do not see why we should discriminate against the Cabinet officers. I should like to have the Senate vote on the question.

Mr. HOAR. Is the Senator from South Carolina in favor of raising the salaries of Cabinet officers anyway?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; if we are going to raise salaries let us begin at the right end of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina demands the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia on the table.

Mr. BACON. I should like to know the amount proposed as the salaries of Cabinet officers.

Mr. TILLMAN. The same that it is proposed to give the associate justices of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill:

That the members of the Cabinet shall each be paid the sum of $12,500 a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to lay the amendment on the table, on which the Senator from South Carolina demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I will transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and vote "yea."

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DOLLIVER (after having voted in the negative). On account of the absence from his seat of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], with whom I am paired, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], but from conversation I have had with him I assume that he would vote on the same side of the question that I have voted, and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted "yea," but I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I should like to ask if the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. MCCUMBER. As I am paired with that Senator, I withdraw my vote, not knowing how he would vote if present.

Mr. DUBOIS (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon and therefore withdraw my vote, not knowing how that Senator would vote if present.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I am informed that he has not voted. I desire, therefore, to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HANNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to ask whether the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. HANNA. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, if he is willing, that we transfer our pairs so that our votes may stand.

Mr. HANNA. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. DUBOIS. Then the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] will stand paired. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANNA. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 21; as follows:

So Mr. ELKINS's amendment was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to state that I was absent when the vote was taken yesterday on the amendment to this bill increasing the salaries of Senators and Representatives. Had I been present, I should have voted "nay."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when considered in connection with the vote which has just been taken and also in connection with the vote which was taken yesterday upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], this bill presents a singular condition.

I must assume that when the Senate voted down the proposition to increase the salaries of its own members and the members of the House of Representatives it did so because it believed that the members of this body and of the other House are not entitled to an increase in their compensation. I know there are some men uncharitable enough to say that they voted it down because they feared to do what was right when the right happened to be in their own interest. I myself am not at liberty to assume such a fact, and I conclude that it was the Senate's deliberate judgment that the present salary of both Senators and Representatives is entirely sufficient; I must draw the same conclusion with reference to the salary of Cabinet officers.

Then we have this peculiar condition of affairs, that in the judgment of the Senate that particular class of Government officials who, excepting the President alone, already draw the highest salaries, hold their offices for the longest term, have the least expense in executing the duties of their place, and undergo the least drudgery, are the only officials in the service of the Government who are entitled to an increase in their compensation. The judges of the Supreme Court to-day work fewer hours in every day and fewer days in every year than any member of this body who faithfully meets and discharges his duties. If it be said that the honor of that station is greater than the honor of this, then I answer that this is all the more reason why its salary should not be so great.

The truth is, Mr. President, that in fixing the salaries of high public officials they ought all to be so adjusted that the salary itself should never become an inducement to seek or to accept a great office. The salary should be so fixed as to enable the occupant to support himself and his family in decency and comfort, and no more. All above this reasonable provision ought to be the honor of the place, and that ought to appeal to the ambition and not to the greed of an American citizen.

I believe our salaries are now sufficient; not that we could not realize more from our professional or business engagements, but not one amongst us came here for the salary; all came for the honor of the place. If you were to double the salary you would not add to the honor, nor would you add very much to the comfort of the members. You would simply add to the exactions which are levied against us; you would probably double the charges of all the taverns in the city; probably double the prices of all the tradesmen with whom we deal, for the rule in Washington seems to be to assess us so that there shall be nothing left at the end of each year anyway. But even if it would increase our comfort to increase our salaries, I would still contend that the salary ought never to be made an incentive for any man to seek or to accept this place.

But while that is true of us who serve in the legislative department, is it not also true of those who serve in a judicial capacity? The Chief Justice of the United States holds the highest prize of the greatest profession in the world; it is the very topmost round in the profession of the law, and surely, having reached that, he ought to be content with the honor and a salary sufficient to keep him in decency and comfort.

Mr. President, the greatest curse of official life in Washington is that it is fast becoming impossible for a poor man to support the expense. We have heard it asserted that Cabinet officers have been compelled to resign their places because $8,000 a year would not provide for their expenses. Do you expect to remedy that by increasing the salaries? No, sir. You simply increase the appetite for more by yielding to the demands of to-day. Give them $12,500, and still the disparity between their expenditures and their luxuries would be as great when compared with the circle next above them as it is to-day. You can go on increasing the salaries of those who serve the Government until you make them so great that the offices are sought for the sake of the salaries, thus diminishing the honor without satisfying the occupant.

I undertake to say that there is no man who faithfully and diligently serves a plain republican form of government who can not meet all reasonable expenses upon the salaries now paid; and when you make the salaries great enough not only to justify, but to invite extravagancies you do the people who pay the salaries and the officers who receive them an injury.

Mr. President, if I had had my way I would have put the amendment increasing the salaries of Senators and Representatives on this bill, and it would never have passed either this body or the other. While there is some question in the minds of many gentlemen as to the propriety of making a bad bill worse, my own opinion is that there can be no doubt on that point, provided we make it so bad as to beat it entirely; and I intend at the proper time to move to recommit this bill with instructions to revise the whole list of salaries. If, in revising them, the committee add anything to the salaries of Senators and Representatives it will defeat the bill and we will at least save the Treasury the burden and the country the bad example of making high salaries higher.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BAILEY. As no other Senator seems desirous to address the Senate, I presume now will be the proper time to make the motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to revise the whole list of Government salaries.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator if he can not make that motion as well at the next stage, on the passage of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. The proposition is to order the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and this is the proper time to make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entirely in order after the bill has been ordered to be engrossed and has been read a third time.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I am entirely willing to withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order now.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly the motion is in order now.

Mr. BAILEY. I will withhold the motion until the last stage is reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to revise the entire list of salaries of public officers.

Mr. TELLER. Before this bill is recommitted, if it shall be, I want to call the attention of the committee, if they enter upon this subject, first to the salaries of the Territorial judges, who are serving in communities where living is much more expensive than in this community, and serving for one-half the sum now paid to the circuit judges.

I want to call the attention of the committee also to the subject of the salaries of the governors of the Territories, who are serving, I think, for $3,000 a year. I ought, perhaps, to state as to the judges who are serving in the Territories, that there is an exception in the Indian Territory, where the judges receive $5,000 a year, but that, I think, makes an argument in favor of giving the judges in Oklahoma, Arizona, New Mexico, and Alaska the same salary.

Now, I want to return to the governors of the Territories. The governors of the several Territories are called upon to render a service that is expensive to them, aside from the cost of living, and yet they get but $3,000 a year. I know that there is a small contingent appropriation of $500, or some such sum, but it is not at all sufficient to meet the demands made upon them for traveling expenses and other things.

If we are going into the question of raising salaries, it should be done with some system. We should not just pick up one class, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] says, the highest paid class, men who occupy the most desirable positions of any offices in the United States, so far as lawyers are concerned, raise their salaries, and let everybody else wait.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to indorse what has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with respect to our Territorial judges. I hope that their salaries will be looked into, for the reason that they have more important judicial duties to perform and more difficult duties to perform than the circuit judges of the United States in any of the States of the Union.

It so happens now that our Territories are generally mining Territories, where great mining interests are in litigation, where new questions, important questions, involving millions are constantly arising, and where the expenses of living are very much greater and the responsibilities the judge has to take are very much greater than they are in the circuit courts of the United States. It requires, too, a higher class of ability and integrity than it does where judges are surrounded by able lawyers and fixed customs of a community and are braced up by popular sentiment, and not in the wild, far-off country, where millions are involved, and where, I say, strong men, good lawyers, and men of great common sense, who can deal with new questions, are required. A neglect in that particular has led to very injurious results. I hope, if this subject is to be considered, that those judges may also be taken into consideration.

We are acquiring new country all the time which presents new questions, which requires greater learning, experience, common sense, and all that, than is required of the class of men in the States who, in a large measure, do merely routine business. I hope that matter will be considered, if not on this bill, at an early opportunity.

Mr. HOAR. The instructions proposed would, in my opinion—and I have had some experience in such matters—require the labors of a commission or a committee for at least two years.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a proper criticism, and I was going to modify my motion.

Mr. HOAR. I will finish what I was going to say, if the Senator will pardon me.

It would require the going into the salaries of letter carriers, the salaries of the employees of the different custom-houses, of the different Territorial officers, and all the officers who are under the charge of other committees. The Judiciary Committee has no special knowledge of them, and it would take, as I have said, an industrious commission at least two years to carry out the instruction. So that the motion to recommit the bill, whether designed or not, is hostile to the bill. The Senator himself has not suggested a single observation as to which salaries he thinks ought to be raised.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say I frankly stated to the Senate that the one purpose I had in moving to recommit the bill was to load it down so far as to render its passage impossible. I made no concealment of that. But there are some who would vote for the motion to recommit if properly limited, and I propose to modify the motion that far. I had no expectation or hope that it would be adopted by the Senate anyway, and was not, therefore, careful as to the form; but in view of the fact that at least one or two Senators are disposed to vote for the motion if properly limited, I now move to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to revise the list of salaries of the judges of the United States, of the judges of the several Territories, of Senators and Representatives in Congress, of the heads of Executive Departments, and I will include also in the motion the Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has stated his motion in the hearing of the Senate, and the Chair will not repeat it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to recommit with instructions. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas whether it would not be well enough to include the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the United States?

Mr. BAILEY. The Speaker of the House is included in the membership of the House, but the Vice-President is not included in the membership of the Senate.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The salary of the Speaker is now higher than that of a member of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I know, but in fixing the salaries of members of the House the committee will also be authorized to fix the salary of that particular officer.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). May I inquire of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] whether we can make the same exchange of pairs that we made on the previous vote?

Mr. DUBOIS. My pair, I will state to the Senator, has come in.

Mr. HANNA. Then I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is detained at home by illness. I imagine that, if present, the Senator from Missouri would vote to recommit the bill, and as I would vote against recommittal if at liberty to vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not know how he would vote, but if he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. I do not know how he would vote, if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bacon,	Culberson,	Jones, Ark.	Stewart,
Bailey,	Dietrich,	Kittredge,	Taliaferro,
Bate,	Dubois,	McCumber,	Teller,
Berry,	Gamble,	Mallory,	Tillman,
Carmack,	Gibson,	Martin,	Wellington.
Clark, Mont.	Hansbrough,	Mitchell,
Clay,	Harris,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Dryden,	Hawley,	Penrose,
Bard,	Elkins,	Hoar,	Perkins,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	Jones, Nev.	Platt, N. Y.
Burrows,	Foraker,	Kean,	Proctor,
Burton,	Frye,	Kearns,	Quarles,
Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger,	Lodge,	Scott,
Cullom,	Hale,	McComas,	Simon,
Dillingham,	Hanna,	Patterson,	Spooner.

NOT VOTING—27.

Aldrich,	Dolliver,	Mason,	Rawlins,
Blackburn,	Foster, La.	Millard,	Simmons,
Burnham,	Foster, Wash.	Money,	Turner,
Clapp,	McEnery,	Nelson,	Vest,
Daniel,	McLaurin, Miss.	Platt, Conn.	Warren,
Deboe,	McLaurin, S. C.	Pritchard,	Wetmore.
Depew,	McMillan,	Quay,

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill with instructions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be read a third time?

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived yesterday, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]——

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, there is so much noise in the Chamber that we can not hear what is being said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will suspend one moment. Senators will please resume their seats and cease conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I am persuaded by the personal plea of my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], to forego what I was about to say. I will defer the statement with respect to the Alaska case until some future time, in order to accommodate my friend the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BERRY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLLIVER (when his name was called). If the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], with whom I am paired, were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Mr. MCLAURIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. He being absent, I refrain from voting.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PETTUS (when Mr. MORGAN'S name was called). My colleague is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I am told he would vote "yea" on this question. I should vote "nay" if at liberty to vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—years 39, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Dubois,	Hawley,	Penrose,
Allison,	Elkins,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,
Bard,	Fairbanks,	Hoar,	Platt, N. Y.
Beveridge,	Foraker,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Burrows,	Frye,	Kean,	Quarles,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for land situate in the District of Columbia.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that in considering it committee amendments shall be first taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, and that committee amendments shall first receive consideration by the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, after line 18, to insert:

For repaying to the Government of Mexico money erroneously claimed by and paid to the United States on account of the awards, adjudged to have been fraudulently made, in the La Abra and Weil claims, $412,572.70.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 3, to insert:

Rent of building for storage, Treasury Department: For rental of building at the rate of $250 per month, for five months ending June 30, 1902, $1,250, or so much thereof as may be necessary; to provide room for the increase of the clerical force in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, for storage of documents and records and for shelving for same, $4,000, and for transferring documents and records to said building, $1,500; in all, $6,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 14, to insert:

For rent of an additional room for use of the Bureau of Statistics, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two," and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of drawback or rebate on original and unbroken factory packages of smoking and manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, as provided in section 4 of the act approved March 2, 1901, amending the war-revenue act of June 30, 1898, and to reduce taxation thereunder, $3,250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 13, to insert:

Rent of buildings, Cleveland, Ohio: For rental of quarters at Cleveland, Ohio: For rental of temporary quarters for the accommodation of Government officials, and for moving furniture, fixtures, safes, and other Government property, and other contingent expenses incidental to such removal, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 6, to insert:

For repairs and increased accommodation in the post-office and custom-house building in the customs district of Frenchmans Bay, Maine, and extension of the heating apparatus in the same, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 10, to insert:

For post-office at Columbus, Ga.: For completion of building under present limit, $3,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay from this appropriation to Messrs. Richardson & Burgess, contractors for the construction of the addition to said building, the sum of $2,530.62, for continuing the terra cotta cornice and frieze of said addition, to correspond with the cornice and frieze of main portions of said building, the balance of said appropriation to be used for the completion of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 21, to insert:

For Treasury building, Washington, D. C.: For new roof, $15,000; for general repairs, $1,000; for new marble steps from first to second floors, east front (inside), $1,000; in all, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 2, to insert:

For Butler Building: For plumbing, painting, new roof, and general repairs, Butler Building, occupied by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 16, to insert:

Territory of Arizona: For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 19, to insert:

Territory of New Mexico: For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 9, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Erwin, Tenn.: For the completion of the fish-cultural station of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Erwin, Tenn., including the construction of ponds and an additional water supply, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 14, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Green Lake, Me.: For the completion of the fish-cultural station of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Green Lake, Me., including the construction of ponds, roads, and buildings, extension of wharf, purchase of land, and an additional water supply, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 20, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Duluth, Minn.: For the completion of the fish-cultural station of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Duluth, Minn., including improvement of grounds and an additional water supply, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 18, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Gloucester, Mass.: For the completion of the fish hatchery of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Gloucester, Mass., including the construction of retaining pens for holding live codfish, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 5, to insert:

Fish hatchery, Woods Hole, Mass.: For the purchase and installation of a steam boiler at the fish hatchery of the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Woods Hole, Mass., $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 9, to insert:

Lobster hatchery, Maine: For the completion of the lobster hatchery in Maine, including the purchase of additional land, the construction or purchase of a building for the superintendent's residence, and for equipment, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 14, to insert:

Steamer Albatross, Fish Commission: For the construction or purchase of a surfboat for the use of the United States Fish Commission steamer Albatross, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 18, to insert:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

To pay Edward A. Moseley, secretary and disbursing agent Interstate Commerce Commission, the amount disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury for official telegrams paid by him in the fiscal year 1900 by order of the Commission, $321.56.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 14, on page 19.

Mr. HALE. There is a committee amendment in line 13. I move to strike out "six" and insert "nine."

Mr. COCKRELL. What page?

Mr. HALE. Line 13, page 19. It is the District item about which Commissioner Macfarland came to us.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is it? Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, page 19, after the word "office" it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "nine," so as to read:

Contingent and miscellaneous expenses: For contingent expenses required for the office of the superintendent of insurance, including rent, furniture, stationery, printing, books, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, and other general necessary expenses of his office, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 19, after line 14, to insert:

Surveyor's office: For such employees as may be required in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress making the surveyor of the District of Columbia a salried officer, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was, on page 21, after line 14, to insert:

Statue of General Grant: Authority is hereby given to expend from the appropriation of $10,000 for plans or designs for a memorial or statue of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant made by the act approved February 23, 1901, a sum not to exceed $800 for the rental of suitable rooms in which to display the plans, designs, models, etc., submitted by those entering the competition for said memorial or statue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 23, to insert:

Statue of General McClellan: Authority is hereby given to expend from the appropriation of $50,000 for the statue and pedestal of Gen. George B. McClellan made by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1901, a sum not to exceed $400 for the rental of suitable rooms in which to display the models, drawings, plans, etc., submitted by those entering the competition for said statue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 10, on page 22.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out "four thousand five hundred" in line 8, page 22, and insert "seven thousand."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, page 22, strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "seven thousand;" so as to read:

Executive Mansion: For care, repair, and refurnishing of Executive Mansion, $7,000, to be expended by contract or otherwise, as the President may determine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 22, after line 10, to strike out:

For the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $500,000.

And insert:

MILITARY POST.

For the establishment in the vicinity of Manila, P. I., of a military post, including the construction of barracks, quarters for officers, hospital, storehouses, and other buildings, as well as water supply, lighting, sewerage, and drainage, necessary for the accommodation of a garrison of two full regiments of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery, to be available until expended, $500,000.

Mr. TELLER. I have been absent at lunch, and I should like to know the order under which we are proceeding. Are we agreeing to the amendments as we go along?

Mr. HALE. That is the agreement. It is the usual course.

Mr. TELLER. And disposing of them?

Mr. HALE. And disposing of them.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that there are probably three amendments which will lead to some discussion, and they might be passed over and the bill first completed except as to those three.

Mr. TELLER. What are those?

Mr. COCKRELL. One is this amendment; another is the amendment relative to the office of Architect of the Capitol, and the other is about land offices in Alaska.

Mr. HALE. Does anyone care to debate this amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I presume so. The Senator from Colorado rose to make an inquiry about it. I only suggest that it be passed over in the event that it is to be debated.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be passed over anyway.

Mr. HALE. Then the amendment on page 22 may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over for the present.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator to allow the other two amendments to be passed over.

Mr. HALE. When they are reached, they can be passed over if the Senator will call attention to them.

Mr. COCKRELL. The other amendments that I suggested should be passed over are on page 42 and on page 45.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the order be made now that they be passed when they are reached, so that Senators shall not be required to watch the reading of the bill for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which is the amendment on page 44?

Mr. HALE. The Alaska amendment is on page 44.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Striking out the paragraph?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present. What is the other amendment?

Mr. HALE. On page 42, in reference to the office of Architect of the Capitol.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be passed over.

Mr. HALE. That is also to be passed over until the consideration of the other amendments is completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 23, to insert:

FORTIFICATIONS.

For protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications for which there may be no special appropriation available, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Military establishment," on page 23, after line 11, to insert:

Shooting galleries and ranges: For shelter shooting galleries and ranges for small-arms target practice, repairs, and expenses incident thereto, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval establishment," on page 30, after line 21, to insert:

For the reimbursement of the Philippine insular funds for small gunboats and other craft, ordnance and ordnance stores, turned over by the military authorities at Manila to the Navy, a sum of money equal to $450,042.40, Mexican currency, at the valuation thereof during the first quarter of the calendar year 1900, $208,819.67, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that he allow this amendment to go over and let us have some explanation about it.

Mr. HALE. There is no necessity for its going over. It is very simple. I do not know whether the Senator was in committee or not when it came up and when the documents were read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not present,

Mr. HALE. These boats were transferred to the Navy Department, and the inland revenues had paid for them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Paid whom?

Mr. HALE. Paid the owners of the boats. They were transferred to the Navy Department by the insular government, while their revenues had been taken to the amount of the cost. The Navy Department has them now and is using them in shallow water.

Mr. TILLMAN. These, then, are not boats captured by our troops, but they are only private property bought by the insular government?

Mr. HALE. By the insular government.

Mr. TILLMAN. By the Taft Commission?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I presume so; by the insular government; whether it was before the Taft Commission or not, it was the insular government, and it is simply to reimburse them.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not know that there had been any government over there before that Commission other than the military government.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps it was the military government. At any rate, we took them and the insular revenues paid for them.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were turned over by the military authorities.

Mr. HALE. They were turned over, and the Navy Department is now using them and recommends that the revenues of the insular government be reimbursed in the amount, as the Navy Department is using them.

Mr. TILLMAN. The only question that struck me as being a little peculiar is that we should be taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, or rather taking money out of Uncle Sam's pocket and putting it into the insular treasury.

Mr. HALE. It was taken out first from their treasury. This reimburses them. It does not go a dollar beyond what they have already paid.

Mr. TILLMAN. This money, then, was appropriated by the Taft Commission, or by somebody?

Mr. HALE. Yes, it was appropriated.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the Senator had better let the amendment go over, so that the documents may be read in the Senate which were before the committee. I prefer that course, unless——

Mr. HALE. I can say nothing more at any time than what I have said. If the Senator doubts the statement——

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a question of doubting the Senator's statement. He knows I do not doubt it. It is merely a question of having the documents presented, so that we can get them in the RECORD. He certainly will not object to our having a chance to examine them. What I am after is to get at the legal status of the authorities in the Philippines, as to who ordered it, and what money was expended in it, and how and why; that is all.

Mr. HALE. Here is the document, which, if the Senator likes, I will read, or I will put it in without reading, just as he prefers. This is what the committee acted on. It is dated Washington, January 8, 1902. I will read a part of it:

As shown by said reports, the value of the property in question, as nearly as could be ascertained, is equal to $450,042.40 Mexican currency, and as the vessels and the ordnance are indispensable to the efficient operations of the Navy in the Philippine Islands, the Secretary of War has consented to the retention of said property by this Department. The insular funds, from which the purchase price of the vessels, ordnance, and ordnance stores was paid, should be reimbursed in the amount of its outlay in this behalf, and as there is no appropriation under the control of this Department from which the sum named could be taken for this purpose, it is requested that there be inserted in the urgent deficiency bill the following item:

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, right there, the inquiry naturally arises as to why the insular government needed vessels, and where the insular government got ordnance stores. I suppose that the United States Army was in control, and that its commanding officers of the various departments or provinces, or wherever they were, were in charge of all the Government property. If there were any ordnance stores, they must have belonged either to the United States or to the insurgents, and had been captured by the Army. I really do not see how it is that we are called on by the Navy Department to pay for the transfer of ordnance stores in this way.

Mr. HALE. I do not know. I am not infected with the suspicion of the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a question of suspicion, but a mere question of inquiry as to the legality of the method by which this comes about. The Senator knows me well enough to know that while I am a little suspicious sometimes it is in a legitimate way. I would prefer that the Senator would just let this amendment go over and let me examine that document. I do not care to put it in.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing that that should be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all I desire. I simply want to get at the true inwardness of it, if I have an opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine in charge of the bill a question. I introduced on Friday an amendment relating to a balance due the contractor for the public building at Columbus, Ga., and it was referred to the committee and ordered printed. My colleague informs me that it is in the bill.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. It was referred to the committee, but the report of the committee may have been made up before the reference.

Mr. HALE. The committee has put it in the bill, and it has been passed by the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. That is all right.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 31, after line 19, to insert:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

For purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same, $800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 23, to insert:

For hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; water for all purposes on board naval vessels, including the expenses of transportation and storage of the same; stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, equipment officers on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ship; the removal and transportation of ashes from ships of war; interior appliances and tools for equipment buildings in navy-yards and naval stations, and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards; foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments, and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war; professional books and papers, and drawings and engravings for signal books; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, rockets, and running lights, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages for general use on board ship for illuminating purposes, and oil and candles used in connection therewith; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; photographs, photographic instruments, and materials; musical instruments and music; installing, maintaining, and repairing interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate the machinery belonging to other bureaus, $450,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CULBERSON. The item of equipment, under the head of Bureau of Equipment, which has just been read, aggregates, as I make it, $1,500,000. I will ask the Senator from Maine if that is really a deficiency, or if it is a new appropriation. It seems to me that it is a very large sum to come under the head of a deficit.

Mr. HALE. It is a very large sum. It is one of the incidents of the present conditions. The expenditure for this branch of the naval service—for transportation, equipment, coal—is something very great. This is a pure deficiency, because this amount is required to carry the Department through the rest of the fiscal year; and I notify the Senator that when we come to the appropriations for the next year under the present conditions a very large appropriation will be asked for this purpose, equaling in amount probably the amount appropriated on the regular bill and this deficiency.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if he can give us approximately how much of this deficiency is due to expenses incurred by the Government in reference to what are termed its "insular possessions?"

Mr. HALE. It is pretty much all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Marine Corps," on page 36, after line 11, to insert:

Hire of quarters, Marine Corps: For hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them; for hire of quarters for enlisted men employed as clerks and messengers in the offices of the commandant, adjutant and inspector, paymaster, and quartermaster, and the offices of the assistant adjutant and inspector, the assistant paymaster, and the assistant quartermasters, at $21 each per month, and for enlisted men employed as messengers in said offices, at $10 each per month, $3,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 17, to increase the appropriation for freight, tolls, cartage, advertising, washing of bedsacks, mattress covers, etc., of the Marine Corps from $30,000 to $32,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of the Interior," on page 39, after line 1, to insert:

For per diem, in lieu of subsistence, of four special inspectors, Department of the Interior, while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses of transportation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 12, to insert:

Columbia Institution for Deaf and Dumb: For support of the institution, in addition to the amount appropriated for this object in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1901, said additional expense having been made necessary by the increase in the number of beneficiaries authorized by act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 23, to increase the appropriation for work at Capitol, and for general repairs thereof, including wages of mechanics and laborers, from $16,905.75 to $21,345.75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 3, after the word "Grounds," to insert:

And the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall hereafter exercise all the power and authority heretofore exercised by the Architect of the Capitol, and he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

So as to make the paragraph read:

Hereafter the office of the Architect of the Capitol shall be designated as Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall hereafter exercise all the power and authority heretofore exercised by the Architect of the Capitol, and he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. That amendment is to be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 42, after line 7, to insert:

For payment to the Loomis-Manning Filter Company for filter plant installed in the Senate wing of the Capitol, $1,053.02.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Land Service," on page 44, after line 10, to strike out:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, and the land office of said district will be continued at Sitka. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued, such business shall be transferred to the Sitka office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Geological Survey," on page 47, after line 16, to insert:

For engraving and printing the geographical maps of the United States, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Indian affairs," on page 47, after line 19, to insert:

For traveling expenses of 8 Indian inspectors, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, and for incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, including telegraphing and expenses of going to and going from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 3, to insert:

For contingencies of the Indian Service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents and of their offices, and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; also traveling and incidental expenses of 5 special agents, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, and expenses of going to and going from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days; for pay of employees not otherwise provided for, and for pay of the 5 special agents, at $2,000 per annum each, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 16, to insert:

To pay the expense of purchasing goods and supplies for the Indian Service, and pay of necessary employees; advertising, at rates not exceeding regular commercial rates; inspection, and all other expenses connected therewith, including telegraphing, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 24, after the word "reservations," to insert "or on tribal lands owned by them;" on page 49, line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to make such rules and regulations for quarantine as he may deem necessary for such Indians.

So as to make the clause read:

For payment of liabilities already incurred and for amount necessary to be expended in suppressing the spread of smallpox in the United States among the Indians legally residing on the various Indian reservations, or on tribal lands owned by them, or on their allotments and in attendance at the various Indian schools, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to make such rules and regulations for quarantine as he may deem necessary for such Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Post-Office Department," on page 51, after line 14, to insert:

Rent of buildings, Post-Office Department: For rent of a suitable building for the storage of the files of the Post-Office Department for the period commencing February 1 and ending June 30, 1902, $1,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Out of the postal revenues," on page 51, line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four hundred and ninety-one thousand and forty" and insert "two hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "to enable the Postmaster-General to efficiently maintain for the remainder of the current fiscal year the rural free-delivery service;" so as to make the clause read:

Rural free delivery: For experimental rural free-delivery service, including pay of carriers, horse-hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $217,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 14 on page 52.

Mr. ALLISON. On behalf of the committee I move to strike out, on page 52, the clause from line 15 to line 18, inclusive, and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 14, it is proposed to strike out:

For manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers for the fiscal year 1901, $12,739.70.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For registered-package tags and official dead-letter envelopes, $12,739.70.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of Justice," on page 54, line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen thousand" and insert "eighteen thousand two hundred;" and on page 55, line 4, after the word "employ," to strike out:

Instead of the messenger now authorized but not appointed, three assistant messengers and watchmen, at $60 per month each.

And insert:

One assistant clerk to the Commission at the rate of $2,400 per annum, one clerk at the rate of $1,600 per annum, and two clerks at the rate of $1,400 each per annum in place of three clerks now employed, and three assistant messengers and watchmen, at the rate of $60 per month each, instead of the messenger now authorized but not appointed.

So as to make the clause read:

Spanish Claims Commission: For expenses of Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, $18,200, of which not exceeding $500 may be expended in the purchase of law books and books of reference, and not exceeding $3,000 to reimburse the Secretary of State for the services of a force of copyists to make copies of papers concerning claims required by order of the Commission; and said Commission may employ one assistant clerk to the Commission at the rate of $2,400 per annum, one clerk at the rate of $1,600 per annum, and two clerks at the rate of $1,400 each per annum in place of three clerks now employed, and three assistant messengers and watchmen, at the rate of $60 per month each, instead of the messenger now authorized but not appointed; and hereafter vouchers for the expenses of the Commission shall be paid when approved and certified by the president of the Commission, and vouchers for the expenses of the Department of Justice in connection with the claims shall be paid when approved and certified by the Attorney-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Court of Claims," on page 57, line 17, after the words "direction of the," to strike out "Architect of the Capitol" and insert "Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided further, That the payment to officers and enlisted men severally entitled of the judgments of the Court of Claims for bounty for destruction of enemy's vessels, under section 4635 of the Revised Statutes, be made on settlements by the Auditor for the Navy Department in the manner prescribed by law and Treasury regulation for the payment of prize money, the distribution of such individual share to be in accordance with the orders, rules, and findings of the Court of Claims.

So as to make the clause read:

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

For the payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, reported to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 238, and Senate Document No. 146, $115,038.75: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired: Provided further, That the payment to officers and enlisted men severally entitled of the judgments of the Court of Claims for bounty for destruction of enemy's vessels, under section 4635 of the Revised Statutes, be made on settlements by the Auditor for the Navy Department in the manner prescribed by law and Treasury regulation for the payment of prize money, the distribution of such individual share to be in accordance with the orders, rules, and findings of the Court of Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judgments in Indian depredation claims," on page 62, line 11, after the word "forty-eight," to insert "and Senate Document No. 145;" and in line 13, after the word "and," to strike out "$14,345.50" and insert "$48,970;" so as to read:

For payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases, certified to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 48 and Senate Document No. 145, $148,970; said judgments to be paid after the deductions required to be made under the provisions of section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, etc.

Mr. HALE. I submit two amendments which cover additional items, which have been brought in since the bill was framed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 12, it is proposed to substitute for the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations the words "and Senate Documents Nos. 145 and 163," and to substitute for the amendment, in lines 14 and 15 of the same clause, "sixty-one thousand seven hundred and twenty-six;" so as to read:

For payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases, certified to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 48 and Senate Documents Nos. 145 and 163, $161,726.

The amendments were agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 63, after line 9, to insert:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suit, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," certified to Congress at its present session by the Attorney-General, in Senate Document No. 139, and which have not been appealed, $22,874.31, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 64, line 12, before the word "numbered," to strike out "Document" and insert "Documents," and in the same line, after the word "forty-eight," to insert "and 264, and Senate Documents Nos. 148 and 158;" so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 2. That for the payment of the following claims certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year 1899, and prior years, unless otherwise stated, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2 of the act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in House Documents Nos. 248 and 264, and Senate Documents Nos. 148 and 158, reported to Congress at its present session, there is appropriated as follows, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Claims allowed by the Auditor for the War Department," on page 69, after line 4, to insert:

In refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, namely:
To the State of Maine, $131,515.81.
To the State of Pennsylvania, $689,146.29.
To the State of New Hampshire, $108,372.53.
To the State of Rhode Island, $124,617.79.
And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stats. p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stats., p. 615), heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have no doubt of the justice of these State claims. They do not, however, in my opinion stand on as high and strong equity as the claim of the State of Nevada. The States named in the amendment are rich and populous; they do not need the money particularly; but it is a rule, where interest has been paid by a State, to reimburse that State upon final accounting and settlement.

The claim of the State of Nevada has been persistently misunderstood in the other House, although it has been treated very kindly in the Senate. It has been investigated item by item, and reported by the War Claims Commission; it has been referred to the Secretary of the Treasury and gone over again, and the amount exactly found.

It has been claimed that it was a matter of bounty, or something of that kind, which was not paid to the other States; but the other House does not appear to recognize the fact that this was not a State claim originally, but it was originally a United States claim. Nevada was a Territory and under no obligations to assume this claim. The governor of the Territory was called upon by the Department and by officers of the Army, at a time when they could not raise soldiers elsewhere, to contribute soldiers and open the overland-mail route, which was done. Nevada then assumed that obligation. It stands on a different footing from any State claim. Nevada was brought into the Union without having any public building whatever, and she was brought in with this load, which she ought not to have assumed.

This claim has been reported favorably for the past twenty years, nearly, from various committees at almost every session. The Senate has passed it in various forms some four or five times; has recognized it as a valid claim; and it ought to be paid. As long ago as 1891, when the putting of it on an appropriation bill was suggested, the matter was discussed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and also by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Maine was very positive in his statements as to the validity of this claim. He said:

I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senate is committed to these State claims by vote, by sentiment, and it is only a question of time when they will pass.

It is now eleven years since that time, and this claim has not yet passed, although it is not particularly the fault of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Eleven years is a very short space of time in the life of a great nation.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; but it is a considerable length of time in the life of a Senator, as the marks on our hair indicate.

The Senator from Iowa on that occasion said he sympathized with this claim; that it ought to be paid, as it had been pending thirty-five years at that time, and he hoped the time would come, or words to that effect, when it would be paid.

I make these remarks because I think the claim should be on this bill as an amendment; but I suppose if I offer it as an amendment it will never be in order, and will be objected to by the Senator from Maine, although he has been very favorable to it, and has allowed it to go on appropriation bills frequently. I do not think I shall ask to have it put on now as an amendment, because it is not understood in the other House that it is a United States claim, and that Nevada has been burdened with it, although it was noble and patriotic service on the part of Nevada at the time the troops were raised. They opened up the overland mail route when there was snow on the mountains so that the teams could not go over it. It was an emergency. I hope the time will come when the claim will be settled. It was thirty-five years old eleven years ago, and it is forty-six years now since this claim has been pending; and yet its validity has been always acknowledged.

Before the session is over, at some proper time, I shall offer the claim of the State of Nevada as an amendment to some bill. I shall then insist upon it, and I know that I shall have the assistance of my friend from Maine to explain to the conferees of the other House what it is, so as to let it go on some appropriation bill. That is what I want to call attention to now, so that I may have the assistance of the committee of the Senate to explain the claim to the conferees of the other House, in order that they may understand it, for I believe if they really understood what it was there would be no opposition to it there any more than there is here. I leave it there.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can count upon it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has said in regard to the Nevada claim. A little investigation, however, will show that there can be sympathy properly directed in some other channels as well as in the direction of Nevada.

I think it is a burning shame that the United States of America has not redeemed the pledge that it solemnly made on the 27th of July, 1861, in reference to the claims of the several States for aid rendered during the war of the rebellion. On the 27th day of July, 1861, Congress passed this act:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

That act, it will be observed, was passed very early in the days of the rebellion, and a question arose as to its proper construction and application. It was contended upon the part of the Department that it related only to claims that might have arisen prior to the passage of the act. There was perhaps some ground for such a contention. At least Congress thought so, and on the 8th day of March, 1862, Congress passed a joint resolution with a preamble. It is very brief, and I will read it.

Whereas doubts have arisen as to the true intent and meaning of act No. 18, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," approved July 27, 1861:

That is the act I have just read.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said act shall be construed to apply to expenses incurred as well after as before the date of the approval thereof.

Now, Mr. President, in pursuance of these acts and of certain other resolutions, perhaps, passed from time to time prodding the departments, the United States had up to ten years ago paid to 25 different States the sum of $44,137,590.34.

The State of Connecticut of that sum received $2,096,950.46; Massachusetts received $3,668,091.95; the little State of Rhode Island received $723,530.15; the State of Maine, represented in part by the Senator having charge of this bill, received $1,027,185, and now, by this pending bill a provision is put in by the Senate Committee on Appropriations by which the State of Maine is to receive $131,515.81 more; the State of New Hampshire received $976,531.92; Vermont, $832,557.40; the State of New York received $4,156,935.50; New Jersey received $1,517,026.79; Pennsylvania, $3,871,710.59; Ohio, $3,245,319.58; Wisconsin, $1,035,059.17; Iowa, $1,039,759.45; Illinois, $3,080,442.51; Indiana, $3,741,738.29; Minnesota, $71,075.20; Kansas, $384,138.15; Nebraska, $485; Colorado, $55,238.84; Missouri, $7,580,421.43; Michigan, $844,262.53; Delaware, $31,988.96; Maryland, $133,140.99; Virginia, $48,469.97; West Virginia, $471,063.94, and Kentucky, $3,504,466.57, making a total of $44,137,590.34.

How much more has been paid since that time because of interest paid out by the respective States, or any of them, I do not know.

Now, Mr. President, every State in the Union which furnished troops and aided in supplying them in the war of the rebellion, with the exception of three—California, Nevada, and Oregon—has been paid the principal of the amount it expended. I believe every one. I think I am not mistaken in that statement.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In some cases, notably in the New York case, interest paid on money borrowed has been allowed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In addition to the principal.

Mr. MITCHELL. So I understand. In addition to the principal has been paid to all the States having claims, except the three I have named, interest, paid by the States, respectively, and regarded as part of the original claim, as stated by the Senator from Indiana, has been paid to certain of the States.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Oregon will bear in mind that the decision in the New York case (160 U. S. Reports) does not in any way commit the Government to the payment of interest upon claims against it.

As the Senator, who is a good lawyer, knows, that decision is based upon the proposition that where a State, in supplying funds to assist the Government in maintaining itself in the war, paid out interest upon its bonds and its loans from which it received the money, it is a claim not as interest but as money paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. It amounts to substantially the same thing. I understand precisely what the claim is.

Mr. HALE. I should not want to admit that it amounts to the same thing, because it might be claimed, if it was admitted to be the same thing, that every claim against the Government should have interest paid upon it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. It does not go to that extent.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I understand that. The claim is this——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In making the suggestion to the Senator from Oregon, I did not mean to be understood as saying that the States should receive interest from the United States upon the money they advanced for the suppression of the rebellion, irrespective of the fact whether they had paid interest.

Mr. HALE. It is due to the fact that they paid interest.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. As I understand the decision in 160 United States, it is to the effect that if the State were obliged to borrow money with which to aid the Government, as contemplated by the act of 1861, and it was obliged to pay interest upon the money so borrowed, that interest paid constitutes a principal sum as against the Government.

Mr. HALE. That is it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it precisely, and that is the way I understand it.

Mr. HALE. That is a very clear and direct statement of the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is precisely the way I understand it, and of course I claim nothing further. But that character of claim, to a certain extent, has been paid to the State of New York, I understand, and perhaps to one or two other States.

But as I said before, all the States of the Union which aided in this matter during the war of the rebellion, with the exception of the three—Oregon, Nevada, and California—have been reimbursed the full amount of the principal.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator of course desires to be entirely accurate. Where interest has been paid by certain States that interest has become a part of the principal. There is still due to some of the States a part of the principal in that sense.

The State of Indiana promptly pledged her credit to aid the Government in the grave emergency which confronted it. The State was obliged to sell her bonds at a discount. She has been reimbursed for the amount realized upon the bonds, but has never received a dollar from the Government for the discount and interest she was obliged to pay nor for the small amount of expense necessarily incurred in selling them.

The first claim for reimbursement for interest, etc., paid was filed nearly thirty-four years ago. It was disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department acting upon an erroneous view of the law. The Supreme Court of the United States and the Court of Claims have left no doubt as to the fair meaning and intendment of the act of 1861 and the resolution of 1862, mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and the State should be fully reimbursed. There should certainly be no discrimination between States. Each State which loyally pledged its credit in aid of the Government should be accorded a like measure of justice.

It will thus be seen that the three States mentioned by my honorable friend do not include all that have been reimbursed the full amount of the principal, when we take into account the interest paid by Indiana and some other States upon bonds sold, and which therefore became a part of the principal sum.

Mr. MITCHELL. That may be so. Counting the interest as a part of the original claim, then to that extent they have not all been wholly reimbursed. That is about right.

Mr. President, why should there be further delay? In 1887, I think it was—some time along in that period—Congress passed a resolution covering the cases of California, Oregon, and Nevada. That resolution directed the Secretary of War to investigate these claims and ascertain their amounts. That has been done, and done a good while ago, and there they stand to-day on the War Department records as adjudicated, so far as the War Department has any power in the premises, in favor of those States, respectively.

It is true they have not been passed upon by the Treasury Department or by the Court of Claims. It is perhaps true that some of these States have been a little more diligent than we have—Maine has, for instance—and they have managed somehow or in some way to get their cases before the Court of Claims; and I believe it is based on the findings in the Court of Claims that this action is taken by the committee in inserting the claim in favor of Maine, which is all right, so far as it goes.

But I submitted an amendment to the Senate, and had it referred to the committee, in which I asked that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to investigate the claims not only of California and Oregon and Nevada, but of all the States which have any claims, whether the balance of the claim that any State may have arises out of the interest question or whether it arises out of the original claim. The committee have not seen their way clear to put my amendment in the bill.

Now, I can not for the life of me understand, Mr. President, in view of all that has taken place, in view of the fact that every other State has been paid in full, substantially, if not quite, why these three States on the Pacific coast should be permitted to dangle along, with their claim shifted back and forth from one department to the other, and nothing done to pay them.

It is all true, as stated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], that the claim of Nevada stands on better ground than either California or Oregon, because Nevada was a Territory at the time she furnished aid and comfort to those who were engaged in putting down the rebellion. Therefore, as stated by him, it is a claim of the United States rather than the claim of a State.

I presume if I should offer my amendment a point of order would reach it. I am going to ask that my amendment be read, and I am going to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out line 18, page 69, and all after said line down to the end of line 3, page 70, and in lieu thereof insert the following, to wit:

And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain, allow, and pay the claims not heretofore ascertained, allowed, and paid to the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Michigan, Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Wisconsin, California, Oregon, and Nevada, for all moneys by them advanced and actually paid for the purpose of aiding the General Government in maintaining the national defense when carrying on the war of the rebellion, which shall be done without regard to any statute of limitation or any action heretofore had in the Treasury or War Departments with respect to any of said claims; and for this purpose he is also authorized and directed to reopen the case of any State or Territory having similar claims.

That the allowances so to be made shall also include all claims for all money advanced and actually paid by any State or Territory to their volunteer troops as part compensation for the military services rendered by them during the war of the rebellion, and for all interest which any State or Territory may have actually paid for the hire of moneys borrowed and upon bonds issued, and also for all premium on gold which any State or Territory may have actually paid, and for all discount upon bonds sold and all expenses incurred for selling bonds or other evidences of debt negotiated by any State or Territory in all cases where the proceeds thereof were actually paid for the purpose of aiding the General Government in maintaining the national defense when carrying on the war of the rebellion.

That payment of the amounts so found due any State or Territory shall be made to the governor of such State or Territory, or to his duly authorized agents, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon proper evidence or vouchers heretofore filed or hereafter to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose satisfaction proof of all matters herein contained or referred to shall be duly made; and, if deemed necessary, he shall transmit said claims to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HALE. I did not understand the Senator from Oregon to offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon offered it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offered it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will withhold it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that committee amendments would be first considered, and after that amendments would be proposed by individual Senators.

Mr. HALE. I shall be obliged, of course, to make the point of order. I hope the Senator will do what the Senator from Nevada did—not offer it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator is determined to make a point of order, of course there is little use in my offering it. I had flattered myself, however, that the Senator would, recognizing, as he must, the justice of the amendment, withhold the point of order.

Mr. HALE. It is not so much a matter of determination as it is a matter of duty. The provisions of the bill are simply directed to the cases that are covered by the decision in the case of the State of New York, which makes it law, and they have sent them from the Department as estimates. These others are not sent in as estimates, and of course they are subject to the point of order. I would rather not make it, but I am compelled to do it, not from any rugged determination to thwart the Senator, but——

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Maine is one of the most amiable men in the world, so far as that is concerned. I hope he will conceive it to be his duty, the thing being so meritorious—and there is not a Senator in this body will get up and say it is not a meritorious claim, I take it—to withhold the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I have no desire to make a point of order——

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like the Senator from Maine to give us a clearer explanation than I have been able to obtain so far as to why these amendments have been put on by the Senate committee after the House had failed to do so. In other words, what is their legal status or binding force; where do they come in as not changing existing law, and subject to a point of order to be made by any one of us?

Mr. HALE. I am sorry the Senator was not present when I briefly explained that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been present ever since this bill has been up, and I have listened with all my ears, but the Senator's voice sometimes did not reach me, and I could not exactly catch the drift of his explanation to the Senator from Oregon. I dislike to have him repeat, but still I must do so.

Mr. HALE. I will repeat. I think the Senator must have been at the time busy in some engaging conversation with other Senators.

These accounts, claims under the statute of 1861, for aiding the Government in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, have been pending in the Treasury for years. Never until the decision by the court of highest appeal—the Supreme Court—which is found in volume 160 of the United States Reports, have these claims been recognized as legal claims.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please explain how they got into the court if they were pending in the Treasury?

Mr. HALE. The State of New York brought a suit against the United States, and in this volume that suit is entitled New York vs. The United States, appeal from the Court of Claims, and the decision is rendered and is found in this volume. The substance of it, without reading the entire decision, is found in the following language:

> The $91,326.84 paid by the State of New York for interest upon its bonds issued in 1861 to defray expenses to be incurred in raising troops for the national defense, was a principal sum which the United States agreed to pay, and was not interest within the meaning of the rule prohibiting the allowance of interest accruing upon claims against the United States prior to the rendition of judgment thereon.

Upon that decision the New York claim was paid. Upon that decision the Treasury Department took up the claims that were still pending, which had never been recognized, for interest paid by States upon loans effectuated by them to raise the money to aid the Government, and the Treasury Department has submitted them now as estimates to a deficiency bill, which makes them in order.

As the Senator knows—for he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations—there are divers ways in which an amount upon an appropriation bill is made not subject to a point of order. A committee may report it. It may be to carry out an existing law. It may be by estimates from the Treasury Department; and these claims are put on because the Secretary of the Treasury, under his power granted him by law, has estimated them.

There are other State claims which under the decision from which I have read are still pending in the United States Treasury, which will be taken up and in due time, whenever they are sent in as estimates of amounts due under that decision, they will be put upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right here will the Senator enlighten me further by informing me whether or not this decision is sufficiently comprehensive to enable any State which has a claim against the Government based on money which it spent in the same way, in aiding the Government in a war, could have its case brought before the Treasury and the auditing department find out the amount, and get within the rule?

Mr. HALE. Provided they are based upon the statute of 1861 and the loan was effected by the State and the interest was paid for this purpose, the State will have a good claim against the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Otherwise a claim in connection with the war against Mexico or the war of 1812 or any of our previous wars is barred.

Mr. HALE. They are not covered by the statute. Of course they are barred otherwise by the statute of limitations, but the act is specific. As the Senator knows, it was passed in a time of great national peril and travail, and the States under it raised money, furnished troops——

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand all that, and I dislike to intrude a seemingly sectional claim or complaint here; but if the States which were in rebellion, to use your phrase, have debts owing them that are acknowledged and are incontrovertible, are we to see other States paid, which spent money to subjugate us, patriotically, I do not dispute, or anything of that kind, while we stand here forever and see our claims kicked and cuffed about these corridors and get no relief from this Government?

Mr. HALE. That is a very general question, and I can not answer the Senator. I can answer him—and he sees it without my answering him, because he is very clear in his discriminations—that they do not come under this act; and the Appropriations Committee is not pretending to do anything except under the phraseology and force of the act expounded by the Supreme Court in the New York case.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator, then, whether or not the State of South Carolina, for instance, could bring a suit without the permission of Congress? Did New York get permission to sue the United States or did it need no permission?

Mr. HALE. New York had had the claim in the Department. It had never become barred by the statute, and she had the right to bring the suit, undoubtedly. Whether South Carolina or not has such a claim I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. I only know that I hold in my hand a report here which involves a statement of fact of this character: The State of South Carolina furnished money which the Treasury acknowledges that the Government owes, and the interest on the bonds, etc., is identical with this case of New York. The reports have been sent here under orders from the Senate to the Secretary as to the amount involved. The Senate has passed a bill which requires the State to be recompensed upon certain conditions of facts which were set forth in the report made by my honored friend the Senator from Maryland.

We put it on the sundry civil bill two or three times, and it got lost in the conference which was held between the two bodies. It was put on the omnibus claims bill, along with other claims of a similar character from the South. They always are pushed to the rear. Yet here you come with these judgments, so to speak, against the United States Treasury, involving the right to have the Treasury reimburse those States which engaged in suppressing the rebellion, and yet we who helped to fight other battles at some previous time and have shown our willingness in the Spanish war to fight more recent battles and are as loyal as any of you to the flag, are shut out, ignored, given the cold shoulder, treated as stepchildren. I think it is owing to decency, at least, that the Senate and House of Representatives should take some steps looking to allowing these States to go into the courts and sue, or that the legislative assembly will investigate and do something to give us justice. That is all.

I will state further, while I am discussing this matter, that the bill for the repayment to South Carolina of a certain sum of money has already passed the Senate; but we have had a peculiar condition as regards our State in adjusting these accounts, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Treasury held the State bonds of South Carolina issued in 1855, I think it was, for the erection of our statehouse as a part of the Indian trust fund, and three years ago, under a report from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending an adjustment of these accounts, the State was sued by the United States, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and notice served on us, "You owe us so much; step forward and settle."

We agreed to step up and settle, but we simply said, "Under the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury you owe us more than we owe you;" and the balance which has been acknowledged and shown to exist by the guardian of our money at the Treasury, the Secretary, shows that the United States owes South Carolina something in the neighborhood of $178,000.

Now, I present these facts; and when other States are getting money because they, in a patriotic spirit, spent their money in furnishing troops in the civil war, that does not, I think, bar the Southern States that were similarly situated in the war of 1812 and in the Mexican war from coming forward and asking that they be reimbursed.

I declare upon my honor I do not see why these discriminations should exist. I do not think the Senate is chargeable with them, because the Senate has shown its willingness to reimburse my State by passing the bill. But the House will not do it. Are we from the South, representing the Southern States, to forever be barred from getting these just claims settled, and are we to stand around these corridors as though we did not belong to the Union at all and had no rights which you were bound to respect?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the original case decided by the Supreme Court, cited by the Senator from Maine, announced no new principle. I had occasion to examine the cases at great length some years ago. The rule has been settled from the foundation of the Government, and is undisputed, that where the claim carries interest as a part of the principal that interest is a part of the claim, and it is not liable to the objection of the statute that the Government shall not pay interest.

I collected a small volume of decisions of the courts and the departments to that effect. The decisions rendered announce no new doctrine. When any State has a just claim against the Government, it is acknowledged that that claim carries interest, provided the State has paid out interest. If the State has not paid out interest, then it comes under the rule that the Government of the United States does not pay interest; but whatever interest a State has paid, then that becomes a part of the principal under this decision and under previous decisions from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before we pass from this matter, I should like to have some suggestion, some crumb of comfort, from the honored member of the Appropriations Committee who is in charge, whose State has received its just dues here. I should like for him to suggest some method by which other States which have just claims can get some standing in court or before the committee. If the Committee on Claims, for instance, should report our bills, then could we get them on this bill or on some other bill, and be kept there by the conferees?

Mr. HALE. I should not dare promise that the conferees can keep these claims that we put on if the House insist that they shall go out.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will submit to the Senator, as the House has not put this in, would it not be a little indication of a willingness to do justice all around to have all State claims stay out until we get enough States interested, so that we could join forces, for instance, and in a way coerce the House of Representatives, or receive enough aid and comfort from those who are interested to get justice?

Mr. HALE. That is a first-rate logrolling proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not after logrolling for any indecent, dishonest, or dishonorable purpose. I want to get simply the same treatment for South Carolina that the Senator is getting for Maine.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that there is force in the proposition to accumulate strength by the process that is called logrolling. The Senate committee did not feel that it ought to wait for that when it was met by regular estimates from the Department. We have comprehended in our bills the estimates of the Department.

I know what we have been through in our committee and outside of it. I have a great deal of sympathy with these claims from South Carolina, Florida, Maryland, and other States; but I do not know enough about the details in the Department to know whether the Senator has such a case for his State that the Department will certify it as an estimate. I can not tell the Senator that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose, as the suit between the State of New York and the United States involved only those claims which arose from expenditures in 1861 in furnishing troops, etc., for the Union, our case, or the condition of facts involved in it, has not been passed on by the Supreme Court, and therefore we would not come under that decision. But we are certainly in the situation in South Carolina of not only having a claim which the Secretary of the Treasury reports as just and honestly due, but you have sued us.

You have held us up as being a delinquent debtor and notified us that you wanted us to pay, and when we stepped forward and proposed to pay we were confronted by the fact that instead of our owing the United States the United States owes us, and the Secretary of the Treasury says so.

Mr. HALE. I think that suit has been arrested, has it not?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, we arrested it here in an appropriation bill. It was ordered in an appropriation bill. It was put in by some conferees, and it was stricken out in an appropriation bill by some other conferees as a means of relieving the tension. I stated on the floor of the Senate at the time that I was perfectly willing, and preferred to let the suit go on and let the status of South Carolina's debt to the United States and the United States debt to South Carolina be passed upon by the Supreme Court, and let the judgment be rendered one way or the other, which would be authoritative; but it was considered wiser and better, I suppose, by the conferees on the sundry civil appropriation bill, when this thing had been broached, to strike out the authority or the order to sue the State; and that is the way it has stood.

But I am speaking now upon the moral side of the question, upon the obligation of the United States not to discriminate between States. If we of the South are in the Union and the war is over, it is about getting time that the Senate and House should indicate it. If we are not, of course we shall have to take whatever we can get in the way of discrimination and of sectional animosity.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On page 22 there is an amendment which was passed over.

Mr. HALE. Now, we will go back and take up the amendments that have been left over. First, I ask the Secretary to turn to pages 21 and 22. Two amendments there were not reserved, and I have learned since the amendments were adopted that they are not needed, and the amendments may go out. Let the amendment beginning at line 15 be stated.

The SECRETARY. The following was inserted, beginning with line 15, on page 21:

Statue of General Grant: Authority is hereby given to expend from the appropriation of $10,000 for plans or designs for a memorial or statue of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant made by the act approved February 23, 1901, a sum not to exceed $800 for the rental of suitable rooms in which to display the plans, designs, models, etc., submitted by those entering the competition for said memorial or statue.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the vote adopting the amendment may be reconsidered, and that it be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. The next amendment is on the same page, page 21, beginning on line 24 and running on to the next page, ending at line 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after line 23, the following was inserted:

Statue of General McClellan: Authority is hereby given to expend from the appropriation of $50,000 for the statue and pedestal of Gen. George B. McClellan made by the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1901, a sum not to exceed $400 for the rental of suitable rooms in which to display the models, drawings, plans, etc., submitted by those entering the competition for said statue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HALE. Now, I ask, for the accommodation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], that the Senate proceed to the reserved amendment on the Alaska business, on page 44.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment on page 44.

The SECRETARY. After line 10, on page 44, the Committee on Appropriations reports to strike out the following:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, and the land office of said district will be continued at Sitka. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued, such business shall be transferred to the Sitka office.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I was about to say this morning, when my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] requested that I yield so that a vote might be taken on the judiciary salary bill, that when the morning hour closed yesterday the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] had just concluded the reading of a lengthy article from a newspaper which reflected rather seriously upon some gentlemen of my acquaintance, one of whom I had recommended for an appointment to an important office. In general, the Senator included several gentlemen who were connected with the court in Alaska last year and year before last, and he referred to them as thieves and scoundrels.

Now, Mr. President, that is pretty severe language, and in view of the fact that one of the gentlemen referred to is a resident of my State of North Dakota, a reputable man, an honest man, a man who in point of integrity is the peer of any man in this body, it seems to me it is incumbent upon me that I should say something in his defense. I shall be very brief.

The gentleman referred to is the Hon. Alexander McKenzie, a resident of the State of North Dakota, who was appointed a receiver by Judge Noyes at Nome some two years ago. I have no doubt that the record in this transaction will fully vindicate Mr. McKenzie and acquit him of the miserable charges against his character and integrity. No one who is acquainted with him will believe the slanders which have been so systematically circulated, and the record itself will show that he accounted for every cent that came into his hands; that he administered the trust with intelligence and with the utmost economy. The Senate and the country have been kept quite familiar with this Nome matter, because an organization known as the "Lane Syndicate" has made it its persistent business to thoroughly advertise Judge Noyes, Mr. McKenzie, and other reputable gentlemen, in every possible way. The press has been filled with denunciation of Judge Noyes in particular. He has been denounced in the newspapers all over the country. He has been denounced here in the departments. He has been denounced in this body until it seems to me it is about time that some one who knows Judge Noyes and believes in him should rise and say something for him, although I am aware that this is no place for such a discussion.

The reason why Judge Noyes has not more friends to speak for him is because he is a poor man, and, further, because the syndicate of capitalists who are engaged in the work of destroying him have plenty of money to spend.

Mr. President, I was one of the Senators who indorsed Judge

Noyes for the position he now holds. He was personally recommended by Senator Davis, the late Senator from the State of Minnesota. He went personally to the then President and asked for the appointment of Judge Noyes, because he knew him well. He had practiced law with him, had met him at the bar and elsewhere, and had known him for years.

Judge Noyes was then a resident of Minnesota and had been a resident of Minnesota for thirteen years. He was indorsed also by the then junior Senator from the State of Minnesota. He was indorsed, if I mistake not, by the two Senators from the State of Wisconsin. He was indorsed by the then junior Senator from the State of South Dakota, Senator Kyle, now dead. Judge Noyes had the indorsement of the entire membership of the supreme court of the State of Minnesota. He had the indorsement of every member of the House of Representatives from the State of Minnesota. He had the indorsement of the supreme court of the State of North Dakota, of the State of South Dakota, and, in addition to that, Mr. President, he had the indorsement of nearly every prominent lawyer in those three States, as well as of many lawyers in the State of Minnesota and several judges, I believe. No man ever came to this capital asking for an appointment with better indorsements than Judge Noyes had at that time.

Mr. President, something was said here yesterday about Judge Dudley Dubose, and the Senators from Georgia very promptly resented any insinuations against that gentleman.

I want to state that Judge Dubose, Judge Noyes, Mr. McKenzie, Joseph Wood, and Mr. Frost, all connected with the Alaska courts, were cited for contempt before the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit in San Francisco. They were every one found guilty of contempt after a long and arduous hearing before a commissioner. So if one of these gentlemen is guilty of contempt then they are all guilty of contempt; but I do not consider that either of them is guilty of what the circuit court of appeals deemed wise to say that they were guilty of, and that was a conspiracy. Contempt was the charge against them.

Now, as soon as the Senator from South Carolina was told yesterday that Judge Dubose was the grandson of Robert Toombs and that he was a reputable citizen of the State of Georgia, he at once withdrew the offensive remarks as applied to Judge Dubose, and I am very glad he did so, because I know Judge Dubose, and I know him to be a perfect gentleman. I believe that he is an honorable man. But the Senator should have proceeded a little further, and he should have withdrawn the charge with respect to Judge Noyes and the others whom he included in his remarks, because they were all cited for contempt and nothing else. If Judge Noyes was guilty of thievery and scoundrelism, as the Senator from South Carolina inferred, then Judge Dubose was guilty of the same offense. I do not believe that either of them was guilty of conspiracy or of contempt.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I think if the Senator will examine the RECORD he will discover that I stated that Judge Dubose's connection was that of an adviser, an attorney, and that I used no opprobrious epithets in connection with him. I regret having used any opprobrious epithets in connection with any of these gentlemen, because it was unthought of in a measure, except that I was led by the statement of facts in the paper to consider it as a very extraordinary condition.

I will state here, now, as I have risen, that I have in my hand the opinion and judgment in the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit in the matter of Arthur H. Noyes, Thomas J. Geary, Joseph K. Wood, and C. A. S. Frost. I will read from it later on, but I simply state now that I do not presume to judge these men except from the decision of the court which I hold in my hand. I did not have that yesterday, and to that extent I was wrong in taking the newspaper statement as warranted in what I said; but I do say now that either the circuit court of appeals are a set of thieves and scoundrels or tyrants themselves, or Judge Noyes and his associates are. Now, you can just take either horn of the dilemma you choose, and I will get out.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, of course I still insist that it is impossible to separate these gentlemen as respects the charge made against them in the circuit court of appeals.

I am glad the Senator called my attention to the fact that Judge Dubose merely occupied the position of an adviser or counsel, because that brings to my mind another phase of this question. There was another gentleman who occupied the position of adviser and counsel, a very well-known gentleman, a former member of the House of Representatives from the State of California. I refer to Thomas J. Geary, the author of the anti-Chinese law, I believe. He, too, was cited to appear for contempt before this immaculate court, the circuit court of appeals, for having advised Mr. McKenzie, for he was McKenzie's counsel in the receivership case, not to obey the order of the circuit court, because he as a lawyer said it was void. He said that the circuit court did not acquire jurisdiction in the case, and, in fact, that was almost the universal opinion at Nome among the best lawyers there at that time.

Mr. Geary advised Mr. McKenzie not to obey the order of the court. Not only that, but when McKenzie was being tried for contempt, Geary went on the stand and swore that he so advised him, and in the testimony he said that he did not then, at the moment he was testifying, believe that the circuit court of appeals had jurisdiction in the case.

What became of Mr. Geary? He was discharged. He was protected, while Mr. Dubose, who gave advice to a client—and the record shows that the client disobeyed the advice—was sent to jail for six months. I do not know whether it was because he was from Georgia and Mr. Geary was from California, but that is the fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not had an opportunity to read this document, for I only received it this morning, and I have been so busy in other matters here that I only had a chance to glance through it in a limited way. I should like to have the Senator, who is familiar with it——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No, sir. I have not seen that document at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is the printed opinion of the judgment of the court in the case, and I am going to ask that it go into the RECORD just as it is, so that all of us may have the advantage of discussing this thing in the light which will be furnished by the official opinion of the three circuit court judges in San Francisco, with the statements of fact which they present.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am perfectly willing that shall be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, the Senator is attacking the circuit court.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, if the Senator's statement that one man, who did exactly the same thing as another man, was turned loose and not touched because he came from California, while the Georgian was put in jail for six months, is not an attack upon the justice and equity of the court and its integrity I do not know what to call it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am simply making a statement of fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator's statement of fact indicts the court. It is all the same to me. I know nothing about this case, and absolutely have no interest in it except that we had this case up in another matter, that of increasing the salaries of the judges, before us, and it occurred to me that it was a very good time to give a little currency, so to speak, to the article which has appeared in the Washington Post, involving the decency, the character, the integrity, the honesty, and the judicial virtue of a judge in Alaska, or of the three judges who had dishonestly and unjustly condemned him.

Now, the Senator had better address himself to giving the Senate a full statement of the case from his point of view. In other words, were the three circuit judges likely to have been seduced from their allegiance to those obligations which govern men, after their long experience and their high position—and you might say having acquired it by reason of those characteristics and their fitness as lawyers—are those three judges likely to have been guilty of putting a man in prison for a trifling cause and degrading and disgracing one of their fellow-judges?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. TILLMAN. For the time being I have. I will let you get through, and maybe then I will give you some more. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no doubt the Senator will give me plenty; he generally does.

Mr. President, I want to say a word further with respect to Judge Noyes. So long as the fact was referred to yesterday that Judge Dubose is a grandson of Robert Toombs and an altogether reputable man, which is conceded, and I am glad of it, I want to say that Judge Noyes is the son of an old veteran of the war. He was a member of the celebrated Iron Brigade. He lost part of a foot at the battle of Antietam. He was one of the best men I ever knew, and a man of strict integrity, as his son, Judge Noyes, is, as I believe.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me, as he has alluded several times to Mr. Dubose, just a second to say a word regarding the matter?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I do not think I violate any confidence when I say that an officer very high in one of the Executive Departments of the Government, speaking to me about the case of Judge Dubose and his conviction for contempt, under the facts of the case and the sentence, said it was infamous. He used the word "infamous."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think he was right.

Mr. BACON. I say, in the Senate of the United States, that, upon the statement I have had of the facts, the conviction and imprisonment of Judge Dubose for advising his client as to what he was authorized to do under the order, was absolutely infamous.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think that is true.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask both the Senators a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not just barely possible that a conscientious judge may make a mistake?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I recognize the fact that a judge is not responsible either to the law or morally for a mistake; but I do not hesitate to say, with my limited knowledge of the law, that a judge who, under the facts of the case as they have been presented to me, would make that mistake, could only shield himself from the charge of infamy by confessing to very gross ignorance of the principles of the profession to which he belongs.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now, Mr. President, I am going to ask the lawyers of this body who are present to listen for a moment to what I have to say.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will yield in a moment. I am going to ask the lawyers of this body to bear with me for a short time, and listen to a recital from the record in the Noyes case.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] if he means to assert here that it is not a contempt of court for a lawyer, a member of the court, to advise resistance to an order of the court?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I think if a judge ordered that which he has no right under the law to order a lawyer has a right to advise his client to insist, so that the matter may go to a court having the ultimate right to determine the question.

Mr. TELLER. The question of resistance and the question of appeal are two distinct things. I want to say, after a good many years' experience in this business, that the lawyer who advises resistance to the order of a court does so at his peril. If it turns out that it was absolutely a false and inefficacious order, he would be justified; but if it is a mistake, although it never ought to have been made, if it is within the jurisdiction of the judge, the lawyer is guilty of contempt. I can cite the Senator my own experience in a number of cases. I have been there myself, too.

Mr. BACON. But I presume the Senator has never been where he was so adjudged, or he might not have that opinion.

Mr. TELLER. I was not so adjudged; but I took chances on that, and I knew just what chances I took, as every good lawyer ought to know.

Mr. BACON. I can not interrupt the Senator from North Dakota to go into that question, but this, under the facts as stated to me, is not that case, and I will now only say the words I have used were put into my mouth by a very high officer in an Executive Department of this Government.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. By some one who had examined the record?

Mr. BACON. Entirely so.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, having heard what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has said on this question, I can not understand how it is that Mr. Geary was not likewise convicted of contempt by the circuit court of appeals.

Now, Mr. President, I come to a brief recital of some facts from this record. In what I am about to state I do not propose to discuss rumors or mere newspaper gossip, but confine myself entirely to consideration of the record as made by Judge Noyes's traducers before this so-called court at San Francisco. From that record it appears that Judge Noyes was cited to show cause why he should not be condemned for acting contrary to and in violation of certain writs of supersedeas issued from the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit during the month of October, 1900.

The charge was based upon an affidavit made by one Eric O. Lindbloom, which affidavit contained not one positive averment, and is only a mere notice that certain other persons mentioned in the affidavit either had made or would make affidavits charging that Judge Noyes had acted contrary to the so-called writs of supersedeas; and so upon that affidavit, Judge Noyes being then attending to his duties in Alaska, he was ordered to appear before the court at San Francisco and answer to the charge of contempt attempted to be set forth in this affidavit.

He was charged with no other offense; was not advised, directly or indirectly, that he would be called upon to meet anything except the charge of contempt; and it further appears from the record that this court, before which he was to appear to make his defense, had already adjudged him guilty in another case to which he was not a party and wherein he had had no opportunity to be heard. I refer now to the so-called McKenzie case.

I am advised by lawyers that the decision in that case, at least so far as it affected the district court of Alaska and Judge Noyes, was not creditable to the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. Indeed, I am advised that no lawyer upon that ground proceeds to justify the monstrous doctrine there announced by the enemies of Judge Noyes, and those who expect to profit and have profited by this decision can only apologize for the language in which it is couched.

It is not believed that a court has the power to travel beyond the facts submitted in the trial of a case and determine and adjudge something not submitted to it, and particularly where the parties not before the court may be injuriously affected. But in the anomalous practice in contempt proceedings, Judge Noyes had no recourse but to appear before a notoriously biased court and make the best defense possible. There is no change of venue in such a case, for the court is not only the judge, it is also both jury and executioner.

It might have been supposed to have brought Judge Noyes from Alaska, a distance of some 3,000 miles, from the place where the alleged contempt was committed, and some 2,000 miles from his native State, helpless, without means, and it may be said without friends, and considered the equal in dignity, if not in power, to the court before whom he was called, that the evidence would have been confined to the charges contained in the affidavit to which I have alluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us from what he is reading?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am reading from a brief which has been made from the record in the Noyes case—a record consisting of three or four thousand pages.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that the case before the circuit court or the Supreme Court on appeal?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; this is a brief from the record made in the Noyes case at San Francisco. I do not know whether it is the intention of Judge Noyes's lawyer to apply to the Supreme Court for relief or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator is giving us the brief of an attorney who was defending Judge Noyes or who was endeavoring to defend him in that court?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It makes no difference. If the Senator can find any defect in it he can correct it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not discussing, and have never intended to discuss, the facts, because I do not know anything about them. I would not be asking questions now but for the fact that yesterday morning, in possibly an unthinking way, I injected this judicial tyranny or corruption, whichever it may be called, into the debate on the bill to increase the salaries of the judges.

I would suggest to the Senator, if he is willing for that method, that he shall finish what he has, and then, if he wants to add anything more in the way of facts, that that go into the RECORD; and that I put in the document I have here; so that Senators may read the facts in the morning before they come in, and then we will all be better prepared to take the case up.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate is in a condition apparently befuddled as to just what they are talking about. They simply know that a man in Alaska, who was a judge there, and who was charged before the circuit court of appeals with certain crimes and misdemeanors has been punished, and that was all I called attention to.

But the point I was after was that Judge Noyes was drawing his salary after, you might say, he had been removed, so far as he could be removed, by the decision of three circuit judges of the United States court, for being such a tyrant and lacking in honesty, integrity, and decency. If they will be guilty of these tyrannical acts, I think it is time we were taking some steps to curtail their powers and bring them within the reach of the hand of Congress, which created them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I agree with the Senator that that should go into the RECORD along with what I present.

Mr. TILLMAN. And we will then adjourn this debate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, I do not care to debate the matter; I do not care to take the time of the Senate, but I want the lawyers of the Senate who do not hear it to-day to read this in the RECORD to-morrow. I have no prejudice in this matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Surely I have none, because I do not know any of these people, and never heard of them before, except in the debates here a year or two ago, when the Alaskan Territorial bill was up. I know there was a discussion as to these very mines in Alaska, and as to what should be done to protect the rights of the original discoverers of the mines. An effort was made to dispossess the discoverers, or to change the law under which those people hold. Therefore there was an ex post facto state of affairs sought to be forced, by which the original discoverers could be dispossessed.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the Senater if there has yet been a final judgment in this litigation? I do not speak now of the adjudication of contempt, of course, but as to the general merits of the question. Has that gone up from the court of appeals?

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] can enlighten us as to that. I confess I am absolutely ignorant about the litigation. All I know is what I saw in the Washington Post yesterday and what I then read in regard to Judge Noyes and the move made in this body to change the mining laws of Alaska.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if any Senator knows whether there has been a final judgment on the merits of this case or whether it is still in litigation?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator there has been a final judgment, not on the merits, but rather by default. After they had driven the people out of Alaska they went ahead and got a judgment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not speak of the final judgment in Alaska.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean the final judgment of the court of appeals of the ninth circuit at San Francisco after they put McKenzie in jail.

Mr. HOAR. That is not in the Noyes case?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not in the Noyes case.

Mr. HOAR. It has been stated that these gentlemen were committed for contempt.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is one of the cases referred to.

Mr. HOAR. What I want to get at, if I can without taking too much time, is whether in the case in which the adjudication of contempt was rendered—which, of course, is final, as all adjudications of contempt are, as a general rule—the merits of the question have been finally adjudicated or whether that judgment of the court of appeals has gone up higher. Does anybody know?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The merits of the case on which this conviction was founded—the merits of the contempt proceeding?

Mr. HOAR. Of course, contempt proceedings are, as a general rule, incident in some other cause, unless a man should go into a court and create disorder, or something of that kind, but they are incident to causes affecting certain civil rights in Alaska, which went from Alaska to the court of appeals sitting in California. Now, I want to know whether that controversy—suppose there had not been any contempt of the judges at all—has been finally determined, or whether it is still in process of litigation, by the question having been carried to the Supreme Court, or otherwise?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. My understanding is that the cases did not get to the circuit court of appeals. The cases were not heard on their merits even by the lower court before they got Mr. McKenzie, dragged him out of Alaska, and put him into jail. While he was in jail a compromise was practically forced upon those who were interested.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I think I can answer the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. These cases for contempt have been finally adjudicated and disposed of, the last decision being a fine of $1,000.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the question. I want to know whether it has been taken to a higher court?

Mr. PERKINS. It is still pending, as I understand.

Mr. STEWART. I think I can answer the question.

Mr. PERKINS. Since I have the floor by permission, I wish to state, Mr. President, that I am personally acquainted with the members of the United States circuit court of appeals in San Francisco. That court is composed of Judge Gilbert, of Portland, in your own State, Mr. President [Mr. SIMON in the chair], who has a reputation of being one of the leading lawyers of the West, and who was appointed to the high position he now occupies by President Harrison; Judge Morrow, who was for six or eight years a member of Congress, representing San Francisco in the House of Representatives, was appointed United States district judge by President Harrison, and later, when Judge McKenna, now on the bench of the United States Supreme Court, was promoted to Attorney-General, Judge Morrow was appointed by President McKinley United States circuit judge. Judge Ross, who was appointed a circuit judge by President Cleveland, was formerly a justice of the supreme court of California. He is a native of Virginia and was a college mate, I think, of the senior Senator from that State [Mr. DANIEL]. He is a gentleman of high character and learned in the law, and while upon the supreme bench of the State of California he had a reputation as a jurist second to none in the country.

I therefore say, Mr. President, that the three gentlemen composing the United States circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit are the peers of any in this country as high-minded gentlemen and lawyers. I feel that I ought to say this in justice to men who occupy the high judicial positions which they do and whose ermine has never been soiled even by the breath of suspicion. When the time comes that reflections can be cast upon those who sit upon the judicial bench, then it is time that the laymen should come in and demand that such charges should be proved or that they should be set aside.

I have felt it my duty, Mr. President, to say this much in justice to those three honored gentlemen. I know nothing whatever about the merits or demerits of this controversy; but I believe that those judges, sitting as a court of appeals, believed that they were acting justly and in accordance with the law, or they would not have rendered such a decision as they have done.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am sorry the Senator did not wait until I had gotten through with the statement I am about to make.

Mr. PERKINS. I said what I did say only in answer to what has been said upon the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I want to answer the question the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asked.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not want to yield for a speech. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TELLER. Very well; then I will take occasion to say what I desire to say when the Senator concludes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, it would have been supposed that in this country, in this age, some decent regard would have been paid to the rules of evidence and the orderly proceedings in courts of justice; but far from this being the case, no attention was paid to the affidavit or complaint in the case, no attention was paid to the fact that Judge Noyes had no notice and was not prepared, and in the nature of things, could not be prepared, to meet charges preferred against him for the first time at that distance from the point where he might have obtained evidence if advised of the nature of the charge in a proper proceeding.

I have been informed, and lawyers will know whether I am right in stating, that this court had no power or authority in this proceeding to try Judge Noyes for any other or different charge than contempt; that it had no power or authority to try him for either corruption, dishonesty, or weakness. There is a tribunal before which a judge or other officer may be tried for corruption or for dishonesty, but it is not in a contempt proceeding. I have already stated that Judge Noyes was called upon to show cause why he should not be punished for acting contrary to certain writs of supersedeas issued by the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit.

That is the only charge, and that is the only notice that Judge Noyes had of the proceedings. The taking of the testimony was referred to a commissioner who had no power to pass upon objections as to the admission or exclusion of evidence. In short, a court without an eye to see or an ear to hear or a tongue to speak, and there seems to have been a purpose to thus refer the taking of the testimony to one with such limited powers. And he was instructed by the court not to certify any question or objection to the court for a ruling before the close of the proceeding.

The hearing before this commissioner lasted some seven weeks. The so-called evidence taken was printed from day to day and filled 12 volumes, containing in all something over 3,000 pages.

In addition to that, testimony had been taken of several witnesses before this commissioner, without notice to Judge Noyes, without his having any opportunity to appear and cross-examine, and the testimony so taken, I am advised, amounts to nearly as many pages as the testimony which was taken, and was admitted by the circuit court of appeals as evidence against Judge Noyes.

In addition to that, the record and testimony in the McKenzie case, to which Judge Noyes was not a party and where he had no opportunity to be heard, was introduced and received in evidence against Judge Noyes in this proceeding. The record and evidence taken in the so-called Dubose proceeding, to which Judge Noyes was not a party and not represented, was by this court received in evidence in this case against Judge Noyes.

So that the testimony in all amounts to something in the neighborhood of 15,000 pages. And out of this mass of stuff I am advised that the testimony relating to the contempt charges would be contained in less than 100 pages.

If this court, then, had no power to try Judge Noyes for any other offense than that of contempt, what was the purpose of submitting this mass of stuff? I fearlessly tell the Senators, for the purpose of manufacturing public sentiment; for the purpose of destroying the usefulness of Judge Noyes, so that, whether true or false, his usefulness might be impaired and the President would be forced to remove him, if death does not remove him, for he is now lying in a very critical condition in a hospital in the city of San Francisco.

Judge Noyes was in the way of these designing knaves at Nome. They had carried things with a high hand in Alaska prior to the advent of Judge Noyes, and he interfered with their schemes if he could not be removed. It was necessary to dispose of him. Behold the method.

I have stated that I propose speaking within the record. I am doing so.

It appears from this record that when Judge Noyes appeared before this court, already committed against him, he requested that his examination proceed in the presence and hearing of the court itself. This poor privilege was denied him. The taking of the testimony was referred to this commissioner without power.

On the first day of the hearing the counsel of Judge Noyes protested against the taking of testimony on any ground excepting that of contempt charged within the affidavit. They pointed out that even if the court had power to try Judge Noyes for another and different offense, he was not in position and could not be expected to be in any position to have his witnesses present at such a distance; that it was beyond his means; that time should be had to take the depositions. This was denied, and the case was ordered to proceed. The mere issuance of a subpœna in the case cost $5, and it cost about $1,600 for taking and transcribing the testimony.

Time and again it was pointed out that the purpose of this class of evidence, not bearing upon the contempt charge, was for the very purpose of blackening the character of Judge Noyes and impairing his usefulness and laying the foundation for his removal. All this went unheeded. Witness after witness was placed upon the stand and testified, not to facts within his knowledge, but to statements that he claims he heard made by somebody else, to rumor that he heard upon the streets. And during this time the San Francisco press, in glaring headlines, pointed out the sensational charges against the Nome jurist.

The court was repeatedly asked during this proceeding to put a stop to the taking of testimony that was incompetent in that proceeding. It was pointed out that the publications in the newspapers of the hearsay evidence, as evidence in the case, was scandalous; in short, it was assassination.

The conduct of the attorney appointed as the friend of the court to prosecute was denounced as infamous before the court; but all these protests were unavailing, and the matter proceeded to drag along day after day, with the same results.

The court, at the conclusion of the testimony for the prosecution, was asked to strike out of the record the testimony taken without notice to Judge Noyes, as being in violation of the laws of the land. The court was asked to strike out the opinions and deductions of witnesses, hearsay and incompetent evidence, so that the respondent would know what evidence he had to meet, and, unbelievable as this may sound to the lawyers in this body, the record shows that this was refused, and that the respondent was compelled, at his peril, to select and answer whatever he considered competent, material, or relevant in the six or seven thousand pages of evidence then before the court. And the court, in reaching its conclusion, is supposed to have considered all this volume of testimony.

Now, let us see for a moment what is the nature of the testimony offered.

One witness, who it appears from the record had made several contradictory affidavits against Judge Noyes, and who had been promised immunity in the name of the circuit court of appeals, by this same prosecutor, if he would give evidence against Judge Noyes, was permitted to give conversations he had heard, not in the presence or hearing of Judge Noyes, and concerning the orders and rulings of the court and affecting the character of Judge Noyes; but not a word upon the question of the alleged contempt charged.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. This man was the first witness. His evidence, upon its face, is utterly unworthy of credit. He is self-impeached upon the record. Indeed, he is not only self-impeached, but impeached by every person he named with whom he claimed to have had conversations, and whom Judge Noyes could reach in the limited time allowed him.

Another witness, at one time the marshal for the second district of Alaska, a self-convicted bribe giver, a man convicted of levying blackmail on houses of questionable resort of Nome, was permitted to blacken the character of Judge Noyes and Special Examiner Frost on matters utterly unconnected with the contempt charges. For instance, this man was permitted to testify that long after the commission of the supposed contempt, when acting as an eavesdropper, he heard Judge Noyes in his chambers state to somebody else that Judge Ross, of the circuit court of appeals, was a sand-lotter and placed in power by the disreputable element of California.

The lawyers in this body will know better than I whether or not evidence of that character as to statements made, I believe, some six months after the commission of the supposed contempt was competent for the purpose of proving that Judge Noyes had disobeyed the writ of supersedeas six months before.

To me it seems to have had another and sinister purpose—that of arousing the passion and prejudice of a judge whose passion and prejudice had already been evinced against this judge. And yet this man prior to that time, under the charge of offering a bribe, had been forced to resign his position as marshal, and who had been reported to the Department at Washington by Judge Noyes, and who from that time had avowed his hostility and had boasted and threatened that he would get even with the Judge, who he believed had aided in his removal from office. And yet the charge against Judge Noyes, as I understand the decision of the circuit court of appeals, is based almost, if not entirely, upon the testimony of this scoundrel.

I refer to Marshal Vawter, the man who approached Judge Noyes and offered him $20,000 to render a certain decision in favor of this Lane syndicate. That is a matter of record in the Attorney-General's Office to-day. Vawter himself does not deny it. He says that he was only in fun, but is it not very strange that if he was only in fun, after having offered a judge $20,000, he should immediately resign his position, which was worth to him $10,000 or $15,000 a year? It is very strange that he should resign so important and remunerative a place immediately after making so funny a proposition to a judge.

Ah, Mr. President, Judge Noyes could not be bribed; he could not be bought; and that is why he has been driven out of Alaska by this ring—the Lane syndicate.

Another witness against Judge Noyes was one William H. Metson, a member of the firm of Reddy, Campbell & Metson, of San Francisco, and one of the attorneys for the California combination that had been pursuing Judge Noyes relentlessly from the moment he refused to be controlled by that element in Nome, was permitted to testify that he had employed five spies—this is the testimony that he gave before the court commission, this high-toned attorney for the Lane syndicate—at a cost of $25 per day, through the parties represented by him, for the purpose of watching Judge Noyes in his private chambers. That they had bored holes through the partitions looking into the judge's chambers. That there was not an hour of the day or night but that some one of these spies had his eye at a hole or his ear at a crack, observing what was going on. This friend of the court, appointed to prosecute Judge Noyes on behalf of the court, asked this alleged lawyer, who had been guilty of this thing, whether his spies had made reports to him orally. He said they had.

He was asked to state what they reported to him. It was in vain that Judge Noyes's counsel protested and objected that this testimony ought not to be admitted; that it was as infamous for this friend of the court to ask the question as it would be for the witness to answer it. But he did answer it and did testify as to statements which he claimed these spies made to him.

The lawyers in this body will better understand the infamy of this testimony when I inform them that the lips of one of these spies was sealed in death; that another, a man by the name of Carson, was kept in hiding by the friends of the court and the lawyer on the stand, and who dared not appear lest charges of perjury should be preferred against him.

No attempt was made to show where they kept the others in hiding.

Yet none of the testimony of this man Metson, that he claimed was communicated to him by these spies, had any bearing upon the question of the contempt charged, but only on matters concerning Judge Noyes's apparent friendship for Alexander McKenzie, Dudley Dubose, Joseph K. Wood, Mr. Frost, or Mr. Geary, the latter of whom goes unscathed, unwhipped of justice, if the others are guilty.

Another witness, ex-Judge Johnson, a judge who had resigned his position as judge of the district court for the district of Alaska a year before the arrival of Judge Noyes for the purpose of accepting a retainer of some $20,000 from the Lane syndicate and those interested with them, was permitted to testify that almost a year after the commission of the alleged contempt he, Judge Johnson, had obtained a copy of Judge Ross's opinion in the contempt case wherein Judge Ross had taken occasion to condemn Judge Noyes unheard, and loaned the decision to Judge Noyes. Johnson being at the time very friendly, called upon Judge Noyes for the purpose of obtaining the opinion, and asked him whether he had read it. He stated that he had; that he seemed to be excited and angry, and claimed that he was going to see whether Judge Ross was his dictator or not, and that he,

Judge Noyes, would now begin to fight, and that, in substance, he would teach Judge Ross a lesson.

Again, I appeal to the lawyers in this body whether that class of testimony had any bearing upon the question whether Judge Noyes was guilty of contempt or not.

And again, I assert that that class of testimony must have been for the purpose of inflaming the prejudice already existing in the breast of Judge Ross against Judge Noyes.

This ex-judge testified that at the time he had this conversation with Judge Noyes they were on very friendly terms; that the conversation was a private conversation, and yet this ex-judge unblushingly volunteered statements made by Judge Noyes that, it would seem, a gentleman should keep as private and confidential.

Now, there were some references made here yesterday by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to some statements that were made to him in regard to matters that they claimed to know about in Alaska, to the effect that there was constant claim jumping in that country. It is true, I have no doubt, because it has been the history of all mining countries that there has been claim jumping from the very beginning. But it is a fact that all the claim jumping which took place up there occurred a year or more prior to the going of Judge Noyes to Alaska.

It is a further fact, speaking again of Judge Johnson, who went to Nome to hold court in 1898, that he tried one case of claim jumping. It was a jury case, and the jury decided in favor of the jumper, whereupon, that being a decision which was not pleasing to some people in that vicinity, Judge Johnson was retained and accepted the retainer of $20,000, dismissed his court, resigned from the bench, and they did not have any court up there until Noyes went to Alaska in 1900. They did not want any court. They did not want any justice. They wanted a free hand.

Again, there was the testimony of Samuel Knight, a San Francisco attorney, who, it appears, paid a disreputable character in Nome $750, furnished him by Attorney Metson as the representative of this combination, for the purpose of making a false affidavit against Judge Noyes, and that affidavit is on file in the Attorney-General's Office, and when threatened with contempt proceedings on that ground fled in the night from Nome and escaped to San Francisco, and who subsequently, and before Judge Noyes was cited to appear for contempt, wrote a letter to his friend Judge Johnson, stating that if the contempt proceedings against him were not dismissed by Judge Noyes that the circuit court of appeals at San Francisco would order Judge Noyes to show cause at San Francisco why he should not be punished for contempt.

Judge Noyes indignantly refused to dismiss the proceedings against Knight and Mr. Knight turned out to be a prophet. Judge Noyes was cited to show cause. And from the moment he was cited to appear the result was not doubtful.

One Atrhur M. Pope was also examined as a witness against Judge Noyes. This man, it appears, had been discharged by his former employers, the Alaska Commercial Company, and who had been appointed a receiver of a mine by Judge Johnson, was forced to resign his position as receiver, and who made an extravagant claim for the value of his services as receiver to Judge Noyes, which claim was disallowed, and whose hostility to Judge Noyes dated from the day when the account was disallowed.

I am advised by counsel for Judge Noyes that there is no testimony contained in the record that warrants his conviction or that even tends to support it. I am also advised by his counsel that if there was any way of presenting the matter to the Judiciary Committee of this body, that they would gladly stake the reputation and life of Judge Noyes on the judgment of any lawyer or of all the lawyers on that committee.

As to whether there is any method of having the decision reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, I am not advised, except that in contempt proceedings it seems to be extremely doubtful; and if that be so, it seems to me that the law in that respect should be revised promptly.

By way of illustration, and I still speak within the record, I now refer to the case of Dudley Dubose, who has been adjudged guilty of contempt by this same circuit court, and who has been referred to in the article read yesterday; and the case against Thomas J. Geary, a native son of California, for contempt growing out of the Nome controversy, and who was tried, or appears to have been tried, with Judge Noyes.

Judge Dubose was adjudged guilty of contempt because it was claimed he had advised his client that the writ of supersedeas was void; and that he would continue to advise him that it was void, and not for the reasons stated in the newspaper article.

In the opinion, stress is laid on the fact that Judge Dubose stated he would continue to advise his client that the writ was void. But Judge Dubose is not a native son of California. It happens that Georgia is his native State. He was convicted and sentenced for contempt of the circuit court of appeals for six months.

Thomas J. Geary, a native son, it appears from the record, was attorney for Alexander McKenzie, the receiver of some of the mines in dispute, and who advised Mr. McKenzie not only that the writs were void, but that he need not and ought not to obey them.

And yet the circuit court of appeals that sentenced Dudley Dubose to six months' imprisonment, Mr. Frost to one year's imprisonment, Mr. Wood to four months' imprisonment, and Judge Noyes to pay a fine of $1,000 solemnly find that Thomas J. Geary was not guilty of contempt, and he was discharged.

But it appears that Mr. Geary, during the trial of the case, had an inkling of what the result would be in advance, for he did not attend the trial, excepting, perhaps, on the first and last days. And he cut some figure in San Francisco during the trial; was made chairman of a convention called for the purpose of recommending the reenactment of the Chinese-exclusion act; whilst Judge Noyes and Mr. Wood and Mr. Frost were kept busy day after day in defending their reputations for honesty and integrity in these contempt proceedings.

The matter disclosed by this record is a travesty on justice. It is unworthy any court in this land. It is indefensible from any standpoint. And I believe that testimony of the class offered and received against Judge Noyes was excluded in the Dreyfus trial.

It is somewhat significant that perhaps 95 per cent of all the contempt proceedings in the United States courts come from the Federal court of California; that that court seems to be most jealous of its dignity. But it seems to me that a better way to maintain the dignity of a court would be to command the respect and confidence of the people.

The dignity of courts can not be maintained by unjustly sentencing judges, lawyers, or officers for expressing honest opinions.

Being a layman, I am unable to conceive what suspicion of corruption or dishonesty could have to do with contempt in disobeying a writ issued by a court. It would seem to me that the question at issue would be whether the writ was disobeyed or not. If a valid writ, and willfully disobeyed, as I conceive it, a contempt would be proved irrespective of the character of the person. If not, the contempt should fall, and the character or standing of the man would not be in issue.

It is a dangerous proceeding. It is a proceeding, it seems to me, unheard of. It is a proceeding unknown to our laws, unwarranted by the Constitution, in a contempt proceeding to try a man for an offense where a trial may be had in a proper tribunal after an indictment found in the regular manner.

Courts are provided with the proper machinery for the trial of such offenses, but not in contempt proceedings.

It seems to me that if the integrity of courts is to be determined by their rulings, and that whether a court has been actuated by proper or improper motives is to be tested by a supposed erroneous ruling, that no court in the land would be safe. Such is not the proper manner of preserving the dignity of courts, for I know of no better way of destroying them.

It will not do to say that one or more of these gentlemen who have been adjudged guilty of contempt were engaged in a conspiracy and others were not, for the record will disclose that all were conspirators or there were none. I join the Senator from South Carolina in acquitting Judge Dubose of conspiracy; he should join me in acquitting the others who, with Judge Dubose, were dragged before the high-minded but oversensitive judges of the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have no knowledge at all of the merits of this controversy, and I do not of course desire to express any opinion about it. I am very sorry that it came to the Senate. I do not think it belongs here.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Neither do I.

Mr. HOAR. But I think, as it has come here, I ought to state what I know, which may induce the Senators present and perhaps others to believe that it is quite likely there are two sides to the question, both of which ought to be heard and understood before forming a judgment to the disparagement of anybody whose name has been called here.

Just after the proceedings in Alaska and before, I think, of the last of the proceedings in California—I will not speak of it as a final judgment—the parties complaining of the action of Judge Noyes called upon me and desired me to make known to the Judiciary Committee their complaint in order that there might be some action on the part of the Senate which would give them redress.

I heard their story carefully, They had no written petition and no bill or other measure prepared, but they wanted me to call the attention of the committee to their grievance. I heard their story very carefully, as I say, listening to everything they had to say.

I told them that it did not seem to be a case in which the Senate could interpose; that if the removing power, the Executive, failed to give them redress, they had the remedy by impeachment, and in that case the Senate would have to sit as judges and ought to sit, if possible, as impartial judges, and not form an opinion beforehand; so that they had first to go to the Executive, and failing a remedy there, might properly apply to the House of Representatives to exercise its power of impeachment.

I also suggested to them that as Alaska was at so great a distance a long time must elapse before there could be a thorough investigation if witnesses were summoned here who knew the facts; that they had better say to the Attorney-General that it occurred to me that in so grave a matter he ought to dispatch at once a competent commissioner, in whose ability and character every man would confide, who should investigate the case on the spot and report to him his conclusions by telegraph for the action of the Department and the President. At his request I wrote a note to the Attorney-General stating that.

Afterwards I stated, not to the committee itself, but to such members of it as I had an opportunity to confer with, what I had said and done and what had been said to me. Thereupon Mr. Senator Davis, of Minnesota, then an honored and very influential member of the committee, as of the Senate, told me that he knew Judge Noyes thoroughly through and through; that he knew a good deal about the merits of this controversy as the result of inquiries, and that he believed Judge Noyes was entirely right.

He said there were reasons, which he stated, which I will not undertake to repeat now, where some extraordinary action of the court, possibly in appointing a receiver who was connected with one or two parties in interest—I am not sure, however, about that—was rendered necessary by the peculiar conditions there, and that it was necessary to act in a certain way to save the employment of very considerable bodies of men who, if that business were at once arrested, would be thrown out of employment and reduced to extreme hardship and poverty. Senator Davis spoke to me from time to time afterwards. He was full of the matter and very zealous in the belief which I have stated.

Inasmuch as this gentleman, Judge Noyes, and his associates have been charged here in the fashion in which they have been charged, it has seemed to me just, though I know nothing whatever about the merits of the controversy, to say that one man of the highest character, of great capacity to deal with such a question, and, as everybody knows, of large experience in legal matters, an old district attorney, a lawyer in large practice, believed the action of the judge to have been right, and, further, vouched for his character from an intimate friendship of long duration.

Perhaps I should stop here, because, as I said, I have not the slightest knowledge or opinion about the matter, but I think another thing ought to be taken into consideration. Of course, everybody, I suppose, who knows anything about it knows the high character of the gentlemen who compose the court of appeals in the California circuit. I know Mr. Morrow, and I suppose I have had to make such investigation as belongs to the Judiciary Committee in regard to every one of these gentlemen when he was appointed. But at the same time it seems to be clear that the question at issue before that court was the question of commitment for contempt for the disobedience of an alleged lawful order of the court. Now, such a disobedience, as everybody knows, may take place where the party disobeying acts in the highest good faith. If the question be of the constitutional power of the court or of its jurisdiction, if it be in a case of special jurisdiction (of course in cases of general jurisdiction the judgment of the court settles the jurisdiction for the purpose), then every citizen has a right, and it may be his duty, at his peril, to disobey such an order if he thinks the court went beyond its power.

I suppose I am, perhaps, the only member of this body who personally recollects a famous case of that character. The bankruptcy law of 1842 excepted liens from the operation of the bankruptcy law and provided that they were not to be discharged by the assignment. Mr. Justice Story, the author of that law and as great an equity and bankruptcy judge as ever sat upon the bench, ruled that an attachment was not a lien. A deputy sheriff in New Hampshire, having an attachment upon the property of a man who went into bankruptcy, under the advice of counsel, undertook to proceed to sell the property and hold on to it for that purpose. Judge Story issued an order to him requiring him to desist and give up the property.

Mr. Justice Parker, the chief justice of the supreme court of New Hampshire, took the other view, and on an application by the attaching creditor directed the United States marshal to let the property alone and not to interfere with the deputy sheriff, and each of the judges rendered an emphatic opinion against the conclusion of the other. The State of New Hampshire took it up. It was a Democratic State, and they did not like Judge Story's politics very well. They passed resolutions that New Hampshire would stand by her deputy sheriff with all the force necessary to defend him. The case was settled before it went much further, but later on the Supreme Court of the United States decided in another case a principle which settled that Judge Parker was entirely right and Judge Story had been wholly wrong.

So these men had a perfect right, at their peril, to disregard an injunction which they thought beyond the lawful authority of the court. Of course, they must take the risk and incur the penalty.

Now, when the court of appeals undertook to deal with these men for contempt they certainly did not have before them the merits of the case, that is clear, but only whether their order had been disobeyed, which they assumed to be lawful, because they made it themselves. Therefore these decisions which have been quoted about the merits of the case and the conduct of the parties and the conduct of the judge in the local court in Alaska are extrajudicial and obiter dicta merely. The case never seems to have gone on the merits of the case to a final decision.

I understand from some Senator—I think the honorable Senator on my left, or perhaps it was the Senator from Wisconsin—that steps had been taken to carry it to the Supreme Court of the United States, or that it was intended to take it there, but that the final judgment, even of the San Francisco court, had not yet been rendered, and pending all that the case was compromised by the parties. I do not think it is fair to get up in the Senate of the United States and discuss that question, never finally adjudicated, where the parties have not any opportunity to be heard here, and when they have not had any opportunity to be heard in court on the merits, but only on this injunction question, and to draw from anybody's statement an inference derogatory to any of these persons.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was himself an example of the danger of doing that in the Senate. If I listened to him correctly, and indeed I have looked at his speech since, he included in his phraseology, "thieves and scoundrels," a gentleman who turned out to be known to two or three members of the Senate as belonging to an eminent family in a State near his own, descended from a famous Senator of old days, and personally vouched for as a gentleman of high character by at least one of our colleagues on this floor. It is true that the honorable Senator from South Carolina, when that was stated, very frankly withdrew, man-fashion, what he had said, and pointed out that the relation of this man was only that of having advised resistance to the order, and not having taken part in the alleged corrupt proceedings in the case itself.

But unless it had happened that it was a man a couple of Senators happened to know about, the man would have stood under the severe brand of being called a thief and scoundrel by a Senator of the United States in the Senate Chamber. I conjecture that when all the facts are known that I do not know, and that when the Senator from South Carolina knows them he will withdraw the words thief and scoundrel as to the others.

Mr. TILLMAN. As applied to the Judge?

Mr. HOAR. As applied to a man whom the late Senator Cushman K. Davis declared on an intimate knowledge of many years he knew to be a man of honor and character, repeating that declaration after having investigated for himself as well as he could the transactions with which the man is charged in this fashion. Now, Mr. President, I do not know anything about the matter and I do not care, but that is what I conjecture will happen.

Mr. MCCUMBER and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HALE. Let me, in the interest of the order of business, suggest to Senators that, if this matter is going to give rise to further and extended debate, it is now late and Senators are disappearing from the Chamber, and that either I shall be allowed to go on with the little bill which I have in charge, and which is incidental to this controversy, and pass it to-night, or that we adjourn and Senators get ready for the debate on the main proposition, which is this Northern transaction, to-morrow morning. Therefore, if I am recognized, unless we can go on and finish the bill I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. HALE. An executive session is asked for by several Senators. I will modify the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Before putting the question, the Chair will state that the Senator from South Carolina did not make the request, but he intimated that he desired that certain papers which he had might be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. He is here now.

Mr. TILLMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Maine,

I will state that I would have been glad to have had a little something to say in answer to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], but that will keep. I desire now to have printed in the RECORD, so that every Senator may read it before we meet to-morrow, if he has any interest in this matter, the opinions and judgment of the circuit court of appeals in this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Can we not have that and also the document presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], which he claims, as I understand it, was taken from the official record?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is a brief from the official record in the Noyes case, and will appear in connection with my remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can they not be printed as a document so that we can have them both in that form?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have lots of material.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it goes in the RECORD, we will read it. If it does not, we will not have it at hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I object. I do not know what that means under the rules, but I wish to give my reasons for objecting.

As has been stated, there are something over 3,000 pages of this testimony. I know of my own knowledge that 95 per cent of it is hearsay thrice removed. I know, further, that in that record there are segregations from the testimony of witnesses and statements or conclusions from the testimony of witnesses who have been impeached over and over and over again.

I have listened here for more than a year and I have heard these insinuations made against good, straight, honorable men. I have seen the RECORD lumbered up with all of this trash for the benefit of a certain mining syndicate for the purpose of creating certain prejudices. I have read the records in another judgment and I know how false it is when you take the evidence from which the conclusions were borrowed. I say they are of such a nature that they are unjust in every respect and should not go upon the RECORD. So far as my voice can go it will go in absolute objection against their making their case in this RECORD without a hearing. The testimony is not here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I shall be glad to hear the suggestion.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will gain nothing in the end, because any Senator who wants matter to go into the RECORD can have it read and it will go into the RECORD. It will expedite business generally that whatever is to go into the RECORD——

Mr. MCCUMBER. I understand that it can go into the RECORD, but as it is going in in that way I can note the objections to it and it can be explained, and many things that would seem to be fair on their face can be shown to be false. That is the right that I contend for and that is the reason why I object.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. TELLER. It is the opinion of the court simply that the Senator from South Carolina asks to have printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MCCUMBER. When the opinion of the court in a case like that against Alexander McKenzie is made up of one line of evidence and of ten pages of newspaper reports and evidence deducted from another case entirely, not one scintilla of which belongs to the case in the RECORD, then I say I will object to it, whether it be called a court's opinion or whatever it may be called. It is unjust to force it into the RECORD for the purpose of assisting any syndicate or class of men to create a prejudice against an officer.

I simply wish that Judge Noyes shall have a fair and honest hearing before the Senate, before a committee, or in any form that may be desired; but I want it in such a shape that he can be heard when the evidence is being presented.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from North Dakota object to the request of the Senator from South Carolina that this matter may go into the RECORD that we may have it in the morning? If he objects to its going in to-night, it will be put in to-morrow.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; just as long as I can I will object to its going in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will just say a word. I shall not insist. I will simply call attention——

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish to ask a question on another point.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have I the floor, Mr. President? The Senator from Maine had the floor, and I thought he yielded to me.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I was recognized, and the Senator from Maine asked me to wait a moment. I waited a moment and he took up the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I will wait, but I do not understand the rule by which I lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will wait.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina upon this matter. I do not know what he desires to say, but I am willing, if the Senate wishes to go into executive session, not to make any address upon this subject this evening.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am going to make a speech on it in the morning.

Mr. MCCUMBER. All right.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply wanted to get this document in the RECORD, so that every Senator might read the facts for himself, rather than be debarred from the information upon which I shall talk and which we have all been discussing.

Mr. MCCUMBER. A Senator does not get the facts in that document. It is a false conclusion, and that is my objection to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator of course is——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall have to insist on my motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is of course advised that I am merely endeavoring in a fair-minded way to get the case before the Senate, because I have no interest in the matter and I did not know of any of these men until yesterday.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It may be a fair-minded way, but with an honest purpose to protect honest men I object to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well; then I will read it in the morning.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Read it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota now yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 5, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 4, 1902.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Charles D. Warner, of Cœur d'Alene, Idaho, to be receiver of public moneys at Cœur d'Alene, Idaho, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE.

John F. Yost, of Rathdrum, Idaho, to be register of the land office at Cœur d'Alene, Idaho, vice David H. Budlong, term expired.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. (Junior Grade) John T. Tompkins, to be a lieutenant in the Navy, from the 22d day of September, 1901, vice Lieut. John Hood, promoted.

Lieut. (Junior Grade) Simon P. Fullinwider, to be a lieutenant in the Navy, from the 28th day of September, 1901, vice Lieut. LeRoy M. Garrett, promoted.

Lieut. William A. Gill, to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, from the 9th day of October, 1901, vice Lieut. Commander Sidney A. Staunton, promoted.

Asst. Surg. Eugene J. Grow, to be a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, from the 8th day of June, 1901, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

P. A. Surg. Norman J. Blackwood, to be a surgeon in the Navy, from the 3d day of November, 1901, vice Surg. Edward H. Green, promoted.

Asst. Surg. Edward G. Parker, to be a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, from the 10th day of January, 1902, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

Second Lieut. Norman G. Burton, United States Marine Corps, to be a first lieutenant in said corps, from the 23d day of July, 1901, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Cavalry Arm.

First Lieut. Eugene P. Jervey, jr., Tenth Cavalry, to be captain, January 31, 1902, vice White, Ninth Cavalry, detailed as quartermaster.

Infantry Arm.

Lieut. Col. Henry C. Ward, Seventeenth Infantry, to be colonel, January 31, 1902, vice Moale, Fifteenth Infantry, retired from active service.

Maj. Benjamin C. Lockwood, Twenty-first Infantry, to be lieutenant-colonel, January 31, 1902, vice Ward, Seventeenth Infantry, promoted.

Capt. Daniel A. Frederick, Seventh Infantry, to be major, January 31, 1902, vice Lockwood, Twenty-first Infantry, promoted.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

Cavalry Arm.

Ralph C. Caldwell, at large, late second lieutenant, Forty-first Infantry, United States Volunteers, to be second lieutenant, February 2, 1901, to fill an original vacancy.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 4, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTION OF DEEDS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS AND IN PORTO RICO, ETC.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time a conference report. I ask that the reading of the report be waived and only the statement of the conference committee read in this connection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we have been entirely unable to hear the request of the gentleman. I would like to know what bill he refers to?

Mr. JENKINS. I will state to the gentleman that this is the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for lands situated in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And this is the report of the conference committee on the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. This is the report of the conference committee, and I have asked that the statement of the conferees, which covers all of the points of difference between the two Houses, be read.

The statement was read, as follows:

Statement on the part of the managers of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 5814.

The Senate amended the House bill by inserting in line 4, after the word "Columbia," the words "or in territory of the United States;" and in lines 8 and 9 struck out the words "in the District of Columbia" and inserted in lieu thereof "in the jurisdiction where the land lies;" and in line 9 struck out "for said District" and inserted in lieu thereof "therein;" also amended the title of the bill.

The conferees recommend that the House recede from its disagreement and agree to the amendments of the Senate.

The conference report was considered, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAM WHALER BOWHEAD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to report back at this time the bill (H. R. 1095) to provide an American register for the steam whaler Bowhead, and ask that the bill lie on the table. This bill was introduced in the House at this session evidently by inadvertence, having been passed during the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is this from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is.

The SPEAKER. And the request of the gentleman is that the bill lie on the table?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents, in connection with the subjects under consideration by the committee, as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if this committee has had this privilege extended to it before?

Mr. SOUTHARD. It has always had it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know that this privilege has always been extended to committees that had appropriations, but I did not remember that this committee had ever had it.

Mr. SOUTHARD. We had during the last Congress and the preceding Congress, and I think we have had it before that.

The SPEAKER. No objection being made, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following changes of reference, which were agreed to without objection:

The bill (H. R. 8748) to establish fog signal and light on Southampton Shoals, San Francisco Bay, California—from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 8737) to establish gas buoys at certain points in waters along the shores of Alaska—from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill (S. 1940) granting a pension to Frances Fuller Victor—from the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill 9206, known as the oleomargarine bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the oleomargarine bill, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

[Mr. TOMPKINS of New York addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield ten minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. ROBB].

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Dooley, in his recent article "On the reception of royalty," in his own peculiar manner of expression asks the question, "How shud a Missoury Congressman approach his majesty—on his hands and knees, or through th' window?" The pending bill and substitute suggests to me another question: "How should a Missouri Congressman approach the consideration of this measure—on his knees before the oleomargarine octopus, or through the window provided by the substitute, while oleo comes in at the door, meeting him as of old at the dinner table?" I can only answer for myself. I assume to speak for none other. Speaking for myself, I say here and now I shall not take the window route.

Representing one of the greatest agricultural districts in the greatest agricultural State in the Union, I conceive it to be my duty to the farmers of that district, as well as to the agricultural interests of the country, to give my support to the bill reported by a majority of the committee. The purpose of the bill is to give relief against an admitted and recognized evil. It is to prevent "the sale of oleomargarine in the guise and under the name of butter," or, in the language of the minority report, "to prevent it from being fraudulently sold for butter." Both the reports recognize that the sale of the counterfeit or substitute article for genuine butter is an imposition upon the consumer and a wrong and an injury to the producers of the genuine article.

While the substitute might afford some protection, I do not believe it presents that full and complete measure of relief which the importance of the subject demands. By requiring the manufacturer to brand or stamp the packages furnished the retailers, as provided by the substitute, would afford no protection to the public against the imposition of hotel or restaurant keepers, the proprietors of boarding houses, or anyone else who might choose to set before his guest the spurious article; while under the bill as reported by a majority of the committee the counterfeit article will no longer be obtainable and the possibility of future fraudulent practices will be removed entirely.

If, as I believe, and all seem to agree, this is a subject demanding remedial legislation at all, then we should meet the question squarely and legislate effectively. If any consumer is entitled to relief, then all consumers should have the same safeguards for their protection. If the producers of the genuine article are unjustly injured by the fraudulent practices of the producers and vendors of the spurious or counterfeit and should have relief, then, within our power and authority, we should give them the full relief to which they are entitled.

The bill as reported by the majority provides for an increase of 10 cents per pound in the tax on oleomargarine when made in imitation of butter, and a reduction in the rate to one-fourth of one cent per pound when the same is not made in imitation of butter. It has been contended that the increase in the tax on oleomargarine when made in imitation of butter is the exercise of the taxing power to discourage and destroy one industry for the benefit of another; that oleomargarine is a legitimate article of commerce, wholesome, nutritious, and demanded by a large body of our consumers.

The increased tax, as I understand it, is the means for preventing the perpetration of a fraud. The object in view is not to prevent the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in accordance with the ordinary rules of fairness and business honesty. The tax on oleomargarine free from coloration or other ingredients making it look like butter is reduced. The fraudulent trade is discouraged; the legitimate and honest trade, if the reduction of the tax is of any value to it, is encouraged. To hold otherwise is to contend that in order to uphold the trade in oleomargarine, as now practiced, an imposition and a fraud, a deception and a cheat, and the counterfeit as against the genuine or real, should be given the right of way; while a suffering public, if not confronted by things which are as they seem to be, can at least take consolation in knowing that the article is well colored and well greased and will go down.

Under our copyright laws our writers and authors are protected, and the protecting arm of the law is thrown around the production of our inventors. Every other class of our citizens have received some consideration at the hands of our Government. Is it not time that some attention should be paid to the demands of the American farmer? He is the foundation of our national prosperity, and more depends upon him than on all other classes combined. So far as legislation in his interests is concerned, he has frequently been spoken of as "the forgotten man."

Let us not forget him now. He has never forgotten us. Under the burning summer's sun and in the blast of the winter's wind, whether his sky was clear and his pathway bright or clouded with gloom, he has been our unfaltering and never-failing friend, the product of whose toil has gone to make up our material prosperity. He has been legislated against long enough. He has been neglected and discriminated against until his burden is hard to bear. The farmer boy has been driven from the farm and the old homestead to the overcrowded and congested districts in our large cities, and notwithstanding the progress along other lines, the advancement and prosperity of the farmer is not what it should be.

Mr. Burke said:

> It requires ten times more of labor, of vigilance, of attention, of skill, and, let me add, of good fortune also to carry on the business of a farmer with success than what belongs to any other trade.

These remarks were made more than a hundred years ago, and what was true then is true now.

The American farmer is the most skillful, the most vigilant, and the most energetic of any in the world, and neglected as they are and legislated and discriminated against as they have been, whatever of prosperity exists among them and wherever it exists is due to their skill and perseverance and vigilance and energy, and to their unremitting labors and the virgin fertility of the soil they till. No aid or encouragement has ever come to him from legislative enactments. He asks no special legislation in his behalf. All he asks is a free and open field and equal rights and opportunities in the race of life.

I am not one who believes in favoritism in legislation, or in protecting one industry or one class at the expense and to the injury of others. I believe in equal rights before the law. But I am unwilling to wink at fraud or encourage deception. If the oleomargarine business can not maintain itself in the open and upon a fair and honorable basis, if it is necessary for it to practice fraud and deceit to continue as an industry, then, for one, I am willing that it shall be retired in the interest of honest trade and in justice to our farmers and producers of pure butter. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield such time to my colleague [Mr. COWHERD] as he desires.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know at this late hour in the discussion that one can add anything of interest to the arguments that have already been made, and I feel like it is incumbent upon me to apologize to the House for wearying them with any further argument upon the question.

But in view of the fact that I represent a district composed almost equally of city and country people, a district of two fine agricultural counties, where men engaged in the creamery and dairy business have easy opportunity to market their entire product, and a city containing the second largest meat-packing business in the world, it seems to me that I am in some sense justified in occupying the time of the committee in the discussion of the question that is now before them.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, at the outset that I deprecate the intolerance that has appeared somewhat in this debate on both sides of the Chamber. I want to say that I concede to every man the right to vote upon this question as his conscience or his constituents may dictate. I claim that right myself; and whether a man votes here for or against this bill because he conscientiously believes it to be right or wrong, or whether he surrenders his conscience to his constituents, and standing here in his representative capacity, believing that he represents the wishes of the majority of his constituents, casts his vote that way, I have no fault to find with him.

I ask a patient hearing of those gentlemen who in this House, and their name is legion, intend to vote for the majority bill, not because they believe it to be right or just, but because their opinion has been influenced by letters written in an office at Chicago, mailed to their constituents in a stamped envelope, with a request that the letter be signed and sent back to the member of Congress. I do deny that that is a proper way to poll the sentiment of any district in the United States, especially when it has been for years preceded by literature sent out calculated to make the man who signed the letter believe that he was going to be largely benefited in his business by the passage of this law.

Now, let me call the attention of this committee to the fact that the secretary of the National Dairy Association testified before a committee of the Senate, some three years ago, that he then had $10,000 practically raised for the purpose of aiding the passage of this particular legislation through Congress. Do not understand me to charge that a dollar of that was improperly used in the purchase of votes.

No man of sense believes that votes are purchased in the Congress of the United States. But that money has been used to build up a sentiment in certain districts in favor of this bill; and the gentleman that said that 150 agricultural papers had indorsed this measure might also have added, I expect with perfect truth, that in a large number of them advertisements were carried of the dairy business that was very much calculated to influence the opinion of the editors of those sheets in the line of the pending legislation.

There are two measures before this committee. One of them might properly be said to be a bill to suppress fraud, and the other might very properly be called a bill to suppress an American industry. Every man in this House knows that some oleomargarine is sold in imitation of butter. Not much; nothing like so much as gentlemen would have you believe, but some.

The fraud in the sale is not by the manufacturer, who never violates the law; not by the wholesaler, who always sells it in a stamped tub; but by the retailer, who takes it back to his ice box or back room and sets down his tub of 20, 30, or 40 pounds of oleomargarine, and sometimes when a customer comes there and asks for butter, he dishes it up, puts it on a plate, and sells it to him. I am for legislation to prevent that fraud; and I believe that the best legislation to prevent that fraud is the bill presented by the minority of this committee, which will forever and effectually eliminate it.

All who have investigated that bill know that hereafter, if the substitute is adopted, oleomargarine is to be manufactured in 1 and 2 pound packages, put up in a certain shape so as to identify the article, the word "oleomargarine" stamped in the stuff itself; then it is to be wrapped up in a paper and have the word "oleomargarine" stamped in large letters on it, and around it all is to be tied the revenue stamp, as is done with a box of cigars. Everybody knows that if that becomes law thereafter there will be no more fraudulent sales of oleomargarine. It will go on the market for what it is.

Now, what is the purpose of the majority bill? The gentleman from Connecticut the other day, it seemed to me with more ingenuity than frankness, attempted to make this House believe that it was not the intent of this bill to suppress the industry of the manufacture of oleomargarine. I shall not quote the remark of Professor Adams, because he says he has withdrawn it. I need not quote the letter of Mr. Knight, the secretary of the National Dairy Union (because it has been already presented to the House), wherein he said that they had here in this measure an opportunity to eliminate the manufacture of oleomargarine from the food-product list.

Is that an attempt only to take the coloring out? Is that an attempt only to suppress a fraud? If it is, the man who fathered the bill, the man who disbursed the fund that has built up the sentiment for it, did not know what he was talking about when he made that statement.

But I want to call the attention of this House to a later statement made by Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, who, as I remember, is the chairman of the National Dairy Association, and appeared as their accredited representative before the committee that had charge of this measure, and who, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] tells me, has made a personal canvass all over the South for the advancement of this measure. Mr. Hoard, in his testimony before the committee—I read from page 33 of the printed hearings—was asked by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] this question:

Mr. SCOTT. If the passage of this law should not diminish the sale of oleomargarine, would its enactment still be demanded?

Mr. HOARD. That is a question I could not answer you, because it is too problematical. I could not say what would be demanded if we did not do this or that.

Mr. SCOTT. I thought I might get your opinion whether, if you thought the passage of this law would not restrict the sale of oleomargarine, but would simply make it an honest sale instead of a dishonest sale, you would still be in favor of it.

Mr. HOARD. I am absolutely opposed to the sale of oleomargarine in the guise of another thing.

Mr. SCOTT. But if it could be sold honestly——

Mr. HOARD. I do not care whether it is sold honestly or dishonestly; I am opposed to counterfeiting.

Mr. SCOTT. But under this bill, after paying the tax, it can be sold only as oleomargarine, can it not?

Mr. HOARD. I suppose so. It can be sold to that extent but no more, but I have to do business with the things I have, with the machine I have; I can not approach it from the Federal standpoint except through taxation.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that. But you seem to fail to catch the drift of my question. I object just as much as you do to the sale of one product for another product. I was simply asking whether this bill would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold.

Mr. HOARD. In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] tells us that more oleomargarine will be manufactured and put on the market; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] tells us that more will be put on the market, and that the poor man will have an opportunity to buy it cheaper after the passage of the bill. What said the man who fathered the bill? What said the man who pushes the measure before this House and the country? Here was his answer:

In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax.

In the light of that testimony, does it rest in the mouths of gentlemen who are in favor of the majority measure to come here and say that they are not attempting to suppress the industry—that they are going to give the poor man an opportunity to buy this practical and good substitute for butter at a still cheaper price?

Those are the facts, gentlemen, in regard to the motive behind the two bills. Now, I want, if you please, to consider the use of oleomargarine and the rights that it ought to have in the markets of the country. No man has denied in this debate that this article is wholesome. When legislation of this kind was first brought into the House of Representatives, in 1886, it was brought in on the theory that oleomargarine was an impure product, made from the slops and refuse of the hotels and the kitchens and from the fat of dead dogs and horses.

But to-day no man is so dishonest or so ignorant as to make any such statement in the House of Representatives. The actual fact is that there is no product that goes upon the market around whose manufacture there are thrown so many safeguards as this product of the oleomargarine factories. In the city that I have the honor to represent there are two great factories and several small ones.

We have there no magnificent Congressional Library to which to take visitors as a show place. We have no great parks and no national cemeteries such as are in and near Washington. We have no great galleries of art, such as you will find in the cities of the Old World. The show places of that city are its packing houses. We take our visitors to see these great industries, to show them the most interesting thing in the city; and the one place in the packing house that is always open every hour of the day, and six days in the week, is the butterine department.

And let me say to gentlemen that there is never a farmer's housewife that goes into it but envies its spotless cleanliness. Ladies who attended the last White House reception might have gone directly from the east parlor to that great establishment and never soiled their trailing skirts. It is absolutely clean. and the product that comes from it is pure, clean, and wholesome.

Now, I contend that if it is wholesome, if it is pure, you have no right to legislate it off the table of the man who is unable to pay the butter price for the pure article of butter. Why, sir, what right have you, the Congress of the United States, to discriminate between wholesome articles of food? What right have you to go into my kitchen or to my table and say I shall or shall not eat this substance or that, or that I shall not have the privilege of buying it prepared for the table in such way as to render it attractive?

I deny the right of Congress to make any such legislation. I am not going to deny it on constitutional grounds. I understand too well that in these later days, the Constitution is an old-fashioned instrument that has no place in our discussions on this floor, and I understand too well that in these times of a "shifting majority of one," he would be a bold man indeed who would attempt to prophesy what would be the fate of any legislation when it reached the court of last resort. I remember, however, that that court once said that "the power to tax is the power to destroy;" that it once said:

To lay with one hand the power of the law on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

I commend that statement to the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who have quoted it so often in tariff and financial arguments.

But, gentlemen, let me call your attention to the fact that the argument of the majority in this case is that oleomargarine itself is fraudulent; that when you color it, it becomes a counterfeit, which has no right to any place in commerce. Sir, oleomargarine is a substitute for butter; and, as a substitute, it is the better substitute the nearer it approaches to the natural article.

I do not want to stultify myself by attempting to deny that oleomargarine is colored, just as white butter is colored, so that it may more closely imitate the yellow butter that is preferred in the market—the best butter of commerce. And I stand here to deny the right of Congress to refuse to allow me to place upon the market any wholesome product of food in the shape that will be most attractive to the purchasers of that commodity, provided I sell it for what it is and the customer buys it knowing what he gets. [Applause.] It is a part of the inalienable right of a free man that he should have that privilege; and you have no right to take it away from him.

But gentlemen say that the moment you color this article it becomes a fraud. How does it become a fraud? Is it a fraud to put a little coloring matter in the peas that are canned, in order to give them the bright green appearance that makes them attractive? Why, sir, every man knows that the digestibility of any article that goes upon your table depends largely upon its appearance. If you sit down to the best meal Delmonico ever provided and if you are seated at a dirty table with a filthy cloth and amid disgusting surroundings you lose your appetite. Gentlemen here would deny to oleomargarine the right to be colored, even though it is sold as colored oleomargarine.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. We are not prohibiting the sale of the article. We are simply taxing it.

Mr. COWHERD. But you put on the tax in order, as your own representative has said, to legislate the article out of existence—to prohibit it.

Now, then, suppose that instead of the butter men having a majority in this Congress there should some day sit here a majority of men from the cities, favoring the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; and, suppose they should say that instead of legislating the color out of oleomargarine (and it is to be remembered that the oleomargarine makers first discovered the art of coloring), they concluded to legislate the color into butter; and, suppose they should pass a law that you must color every pound of butter blue.

The blue color comes from just the same thing as that from which you get the yellow color. It is just as wholesome, just as nutritious. It would not affect the digestibility of the article at all except by its appearance. How many pounds of butter do you suppose would be consumed the next day in the United States if that law should be enforced? [Applause.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to vote for your minority bill if I can. But does the gentleman concede that the consumer—now I am speaking of the man who actually consumes the butter or oleomargarine—does the gentleman concede that the law ought to be such as to give him the right to know what he is eating?

Mr. COWHERD. I concede that the purchaser ought to have the right to know what he is purchasing. You want to get at the man who dines in the restaurant or the hotel.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Or in the boarding house or anywhere else.

Mr. COWHERD. Now let me answer the gentleman's objection. They propose to eliminate an industry that to-day is adding a part, however small, to the business of more than 5,000,000 people, because some man in a cheap restaurant or hotel got served with oleomargarine and did not know it. How are you going to prevent it under this bill? If he is doing it to-day he is doing it because he can buy the product cheaper than he can buy butter, and palm it off as butter; and it is fraud to-day and it is punishable to-day in many of the States.

Now, you propose, according to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY], to reduce the price of oleomargarine so he can get it very much cheaper than he does to-day, and the only difference is that he will commit a fraud by coloring it himself, and if the price of the uncolored oleomargarine is reduced you have only added to the profit his fraud will bring him.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. SOUTHARD. I do not understand that the gentleman has answered my question. If it is possible to have it so, ought not the law to be such that the actual consumer of the butter may know what he is eating?

Mr. COWHERD. I have answered the gentleman's question—that it is quite possible, if the minority bill passes, that the consumer in the cheap restaurant will get oleomargarine; but he goes there in order to get a good meal and get it cheap, and he would rather have oleomargarine than to have cheap butter.

I will answer the gentleman's question further by saying that if the majority bill passes he will get the same product. The only difference is that there will be the added incentive to the restaurant keeper or the hotel keeper to buy oleomargarine uncolored and color it himself, because he will make more money by committing the fraud.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Now, will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. COWHERD. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman tell me how he will be able to tell what he is eating in the ten-dollar-a-day hotel any more than he will in the cheap restaurant?

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman very well knows that if he goes to the high-priced hotel he gets the best food, because they can afford to serve it, and business policy compels them to do so.

Mr. SOUTHARD. In other words, he must depend on somebody's say so for his knowledge of what he is eating.

Mr. COWHERD. He must depend on somebody's say so as to whether he gets fresh beef in the hash that is served to him or whether he gets the scraps of beef taken from the plates of yesterday. Is the Congress of the United States to pass a law to send an inspector into each hotel to see that they do not gather up the scraps of meat to-day from the plates and serve them as hash to-morrow?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Do you want to put butter on the plane of boardinghouse hash?

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman is putting it on the plane of boarding-house hash if he votes for the majority bill.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The gentleman from Missouri is doing it.

Mr. COWHERD. No, the gentleman from Ohio is doing it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent anything.

Mr. COWHERD. I do not desire to.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The bill provides that the hotelkeeper or boardinghouse keeper who colors the butter or oleomargarine——

Mr. COWHERD. It will be a crime.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That he will be subject to the same penalty as the manufacturer.

Mr. COWHERD. I hope the gentleman will not take my time.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The consumer may color his butter any shade that he desires.

Mr. COWHERD. I understand the gentleman's proposition. In many of the States to-day it is provided that if you put oleomargarine on a hotel table you must put it on in a dish that is stamped "oleomargarine" in the china. You are simply trying to get the United States to take care of State legislation in that matter. It is a proposition that depends on the States.

Right there, let me call your attention to this fact: A great outcry is made in the hearings before the committee because they can not enforce the laws in certain portions of certain States, and every gentleman who takes the floor calls attention to the fact that 32 States of the Union have prohibited the coloring of oleomargarine and that the laws of these States are not being enforced, and therefore that Congress should come in and enforce the laws of the States in the jurisdiction of the States.

Let me cite an illustration in this very testimony. Some gentleman before the committee said that at Pittsburg—and that is one of the complaints of the advocates of the bill—the grand jury refused to indict and the prosecutor to prosecute. Why? Because you forced an unnatural law upon the people of that community, one that the sentiment of that community did not approve. Pittsburg has a large population of wage earners who insist upon their right to purchase at a price within their reach a wholesome substitute for the creamery butter, which they can not afford, and you are asking the Congress of the United States to go into the States and enforce laws that are against the sentiment of the State, and that are not enforced for that very reason.

Why, some of my friends on this floor are from prohibition States. Prohibition is enforced in one community and absolutely disregarded in another community in the same State. I can go into Kansas and walk into a city and show you fifty saloons that pay their license as regularly as any saloon across the line in my State. Why is not the law enforced? Because it is against the sentiment of the community. If you have any right to regulate the sentiment of the States, you may just as well go into the prohibition business as into the oleomargarine business.

Mr. CLAYTON. Would it interrupt the gentleman's speech for me to suggest by way of benefit to the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Ohio, to ask why the friends of this measure, who are so anxious to prevent fraud and so anxious to have pure food, have not included in their measure a tax on renovated butter? Now, I have great respect for the cleanliness of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Connecticut, but I would not like to eat butter scraped from their plates in a first-class hotel and renovated and sold to me in some other first-class hotel as first-class butter, although the gentlemen are both very clean gentlemen.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will yield time to the gentleman from Missouri if he will permit me to answer that question.

Mr. COWHERD. My time is expiring.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will give you all the time you ask for if I be given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. COWHERD. All right.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In the matter of renovated butter I will go as far as the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why have not you done it?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. To prevent the fraudulent sale of renovated butter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why have you not done it in this case?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. It was not considered in connection with this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is your committee paralyzed? Why did you not offer a bill or offer an amendment? If your right hand is paralyzed I will draw the amendment for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWHERD. I will be glad to resume the floor to bring about peace and prevent hostilities. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I will yield such time to the gentleman as he needs.

Mr. COWHERD. I was calling attention to the fact that you had no right to legislate out of existence any wholesome article, be it one of food, fuel, clothing, or furniture, whatever it may be, that is necessary to the life and existence of the people. And I stand here to assert that the man whose ingenuity can devise and perfect a wholesome substitute for any article of food that is necessary in the dietary of the laboring man, and put it upon his table at a price that he can afford to buy it, is a philanthropist who deserves the plaudits and not the censure of men.

Where are you going to stop if you begin this legislation? I noticed last night some merchant advertised silkolene at 6 cents a yard, and I read on further where one was offering mercerized silks for 12 and 15 cents a yard. I inquired what these were, and was told it was a cotton cloth which by some patent process had been given the sheen and appearance of silk. Are you going to stop it? It is a fraud on silk. It looks like silk. A poor girl can buy it and go on the street and flaunt her finery in the face of the rich woman who is clothed in the priceless fabrics of the Lyons loom.

Have you any right to take away from her that privilege? If you go in the homes of the fairly well-to-do people of the United States you will find upon nine-tenths of the tables knives, forks, and spoons made neither out of common iron nor pure silver, but you will find them made out of a white metal plated to resemble silver. It is almost a perfect counterfeit. It looks like silver. It feels like it, tastes like it. Sometimes it is sold for it. Are you going to stop it?

You have just got as much right to go into the home of a poor man and say to him he shall not use this metal because it is a fraud on silver; the plain iron fork or spoon is just as wholesome, just as useful as the plated one, and that he must either buy the solid silver or go back to the ironware. That is identically similar in principle to this bill, that refuses to the poor man the right to set upon his table a substitute for butter which is attractive in appearance, which does not betray his poverty to the neighbor that he may have in to dinner with him, and give his child to carry to school with her an article of food that does not betray her poverty to the sneers and scorn of the children of richer people. [Loud applause.]

Let me call your attention to another fact. I believe that these United States have become an indissoluble Union, not by reason of kinship of the people, not by reason alone of love for that glorious flag that hangs in its place above your head, not even by the blood of millions of her heroic sons shed on hundreds of battlefields, but this Union has become an indissoluble one because of one little clause in the Constitution of the United States that prohibits one State from legislating against the products of another. Now, you are beginning here to-day to legislate against the products of some States for the benefit of others.

You are beginning here to break these iron bands that run from State to State, carrying the commerce of one freely into the commerce of the other. You are in this bill for the first time, I believe, in the history of the United States—because the bill of 1886 was claimed to be only a police or inspection tax—in this bill you are recognizing the right of one section, if it has sufficient votes, to destroy the commerce of another section because it has not sufficient votes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me a question?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; if it is a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. What has the State of Missouri done with respect to this product?

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman from Minnesota has just come in, or he would have recognized that I had argued that question before, denying the right of Congress to go into any State and attempting to enforce the laws of that State. What has the State of Kansas done in regard to liquor? Why do you not go in there and enforce the liquor law? A dozen States have legislated one way on one proposition, and a dozen more another way. Is Congress going in and enforce the laws of the State within the jurisdiction of the State? You have no right to do it. The fact is that this Government is based on the principle of local self-government, and this bill attempts to break it down; and that is all there is to this proposition.

Now, when the gentleman interrupted me I was about to call your attention to the fact that this bill is attempting to legislate for the benefit of the sections of the North and East against the South and the West. I deny your authority to do it. I deny that you ought to do it, in view of the dangerons consequences that may flow from it. Let me call your attention to the fact that recently there was developed down yonder in Texas the most wonderful oil field in the world. To-day we are told that a great railroad is already changing its engines so as to burn oil instead of coal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They are changing three of them over.

Mr. COWHERD. Three great roads are changing their engines, says the gentleman from Texas. Now, you have just as much right to come into the House of Representatives, under the guise of a revenues measure, and enact a bill for the pretended purpose of raising revenue for the Treasury of the United States and put a tax of a thousand dollars on every engine burning oil and using it in interstate commerce as to enact this measure.

What is to prevent it if the coal fields of Virginia and Pennsylvania have enough votes in the House? What is to prevent their coming here and demanding legislation to protect coal from the use of this substitute oil that they are producing so cheaply in Texas that coal can not compete with it? Why, they are manufacturing a brick, or a briquette, as they call it, out of that oil, which looks like coal, can be used for coal, occupies about one-fifth of the room in the hold of the ship, and will carry the ship just as far and just as well.

Then another illustration: Out in my country we are raisers of corn; we manufacture an article from it, or, more frequently, ship the corn to Kentucky, and they manufacture an article that we enjoy a good deal as a beverage now and then. Back in Maryland they make a similar article, only they make it from rye; but it looks just like the other. They have the same color, the same odor, the same taste, the same happy effect, and the experts can not tell one from the other.

What is to prevent the corn-growing States coming to the Congress of the United States and demanding that any man that makes whisky out of rye shall make it so that it is absolutely white, so that it shall not deceive the fellow that goes into the bar and calls for a drink of pure corn juice? This is identically the same proposition. I trust there will never be any such foolish legislation. Once you inflame the cupidity of men with the idea that they can go to Congress and legislate money into their pockets by killing some competitor's business, and there will never be an end to the iniquitous measures selfishness will propose.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. COWHERD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to suggest to the gentleman that if this bill passes, what is to prevent them from destroying the cotton-seed-oil industry of the South?

Mr. COWHERD. Nothing; certainly it can be done.

Now, then, gentlemen on the floor talk about the poor farmer. I want to say that a vote for the minority as against the majority measure will be in the interest of the farming community of the United States. Gentlemen say, "Oh, you have magnified the danger to the cattle and the cotton-seed industry."

I have here the statement of a man, Mr. John C. McCoy, of Kansas City, who has been in the live-stock business all his life—a man in whom, as I know, you can place the utmost confidence—and he estimates the loss to the stock-raising industry of the United States at $62,000,000 per year. If this bill should be passed——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Allow me to say that 75 to 80 per cent of that oleo oil is now exported, and only about 20 per cent is used in this country.

Mr. COWHERD. That is estimated upon the theory that there are 50 pounds of caul fat in a steer, which is worth from 10 to 11 cents in the making of oleomargarine and worth only about 6 cents for tallow.

Gentlemen say that there will be still a great exportation, a great shipment of oleo oil. There will be something done in that direction, undoubtedly, and some may probably be manufactured. But, gentlemen, if you have 400,000,000 bushels of wheat worth a dollar a bushel, and you throw upon the market another 100,000,000 bushels, you do not merely reduce the price 20 per cent; you can not tell how much it will be reduced, unless the speculators decide to buy it and hold it for another year and a shorter crop. It is the surplus that threatens and breaks down the price.

Oleo oil is a product which you can not hold; it has got to be manufactured and marketed, and marketed promptly. I can not tell and you can not tell—it is purely a matter of speculation—how much the farmer will be hurt. I simply call attention to the statement of the gentleman who has compiled these figures and given his opinion—a gentleman who has spent his life in this work—that the loss will be $62,000,000 a year to the agricultural interests of the United States if this bill should become a law.

I remember that one gentleman said—I do not know whether it was on the floor of this House or in this committee: "Oh, the farmer sells his cattle for what they will bring in the market; you do not figure on what the caul fat is worth when you buy the cattle." Let me say to this House that in my city, as I remember, some twenty years ago or more it was a serious question whether the refuse that went from the large packing houses into the river would not so pollute that stream as to endanger the lives of the persons living along its banks. To-day there is not a single pound of refuse from the 6,000,000 head of cattle that are killed there every year.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Does that refuse go into the oleomargarine?

Mr. COWHERD. No. I will tell you where it goes. Not an ounce of it goes into oleomargarine, as the gentleman knows and no man dares assert. But every part of the beef is used—the hair, the hide, the horns, and the hoofs, entrails even. The undigested food within the entrails is made into fertilizers and sent back to the farm.

Yet gentlemen say that we can reduce the value of one of the by-products at least 50 per cent and yet not reduce the value of the steer, even when competition is so close that it is often asserted (and no man has dared to deny it) that if a single packing house in the United States should throw away the horns and the hoofs of the animals it kills, that establishment would be forced into bankruptcy within a year.

You might as well go to the Minneapolis miller and say to him: "You must burn the bran and ship stuff and the other by-products that come from the wheat and yet you must pay the same price to the farmer." The miller would not do this, because he could not afford to do it. Why, I heard some of my friends who are supporting this bill argue, a few years ago, that you destroyed the price of silver by destroying its use as a money metal—and they argued truly—but now they propose to destroy the use of a part of a steer and hog and claim it will not affect the price of the animal.

Now, my friends, this bill is not in the interest of the farmer. It is in the interest of the creamery and the dairy, the proprietors of which are only farmers in that their factories are located in the farming districts.

I hold here an extract from a paper, the Kansas City Journal, issued January 21 in my home city, giving an account of the organization of a big butter trust. It says that two energetic citizens of a Western community have gone to New York and organized a trust with $18,000,000 capital; that they already control over 400 creameries in this country, and that the intention of the trust is to buy all the creameries in the United States. The president of this trust, according to this article, is to draw a salary of $50,000 a year and the secretary a salary of $30,000 a year. These are the "poor farmers" in whose behalf gentlemen raise their wailing voices.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Will the gentleman tell us what paper that is?

Mr. COWHERD. The Kansas City Journal of January 21. The same article appeared also in the Washington Post and the Washington Star and, I suppose, in nearly every paper of the United States of that date.

Mr. KLUTTZ. It originated, however, in the Kansas City paper.

Mr. COWHERD. No; it did not. It was a telegraphic article.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman will permit me to say that I saw the same article in a Topeka paper three weeks ago. It did not originate in the Kansas City Journal.

Mr. COWHERD. The article appears to have been sent out by the Associated Press. It is certainly true that an effort of this kind is on foot, and it is true that it is a practical proposition.

Now, gentlemen, the farmer's butter does not compete with oleomargarine; the butter of the farmer's wife does not go into commerce. It is taken to the country towns—such as is not consumed on the farm—and is there sold to the purchaser direct. Such as is not sold there is gathered up by the country grocer (I am speaking of the vast bulk of it) and shipped into the city, dumped all together, and goes into the renovating factory, where it is melted, treated sometimes with acids, churned again with milk to give it a fresh aroma, and it comes out as creamery butter. But the farmer's wife receives only the country-town price. She never gets the city price. She does not have to suffer from oleomargarine competition, and this bill will not help her in any particular.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman states that a creamery trust is about to be formed. Is he not aware that this movement is an impossibility, as most of the creameries are now owned by the farmers themselves, and that when the creamery trusts reduce the price of cream to a point below what is reasonable, the co-operative creameries are put in operation, and under such circumstances the creameries operated by individuals or trusts are compelled to close?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not know that to be the fact, and I do not believe it to be the fact. I have the statement here of this reputable paper that these two men now own 400 creameries themselves, and they are not farmers, either; and I know that in my own country cooperative creameries have been established, have failed, and gone into the hands of individuals who are manufacturing butter just as you would manufacture any other product, and who are no more farmers than the manufacturer of iron or the manufacturer of these desks are farmers.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You state that oleo is not dragging down the price of the farmers' butter?

Mr. COWHERD. Not the country butter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am talking about the country butter.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I want to state to you that the people in my Congressional district, which is a part of the blue-grass region of Tennessee, say that their butter business is being destroyed by selling "oleo" as "butter."

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, and I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that ninety-nine out of every hundred letters that have been received making that statement were prepared in an office in Chicago, were inclosed in an envelope, and with it was inclosed a stamped envelope and a request that the farmer would sign the letter and send it to his Congressman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I want to correct my friend by telling him that the letters were three and four pages long, written by some of the best men in Tennessee, men of national reputation.

Mr. COWHERD. I have seen them, and have talked with the men who wrote them from my district.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And there was not a Chicago-prepared letter among those that I have received.

Mr. COWHERD. They told me in some instances that they copied them in ink, and did so at the request of the dairy association which sent them the letters, and made the request that it be copied in their own handwriting. And I want to say that I had this matter up in my district last year, when I had occasion to canvass the district somewhat on it, and I did not find the farmers very much interested in it. The dairies and the creameries are interested in it.

Gentlemen, I see my time has about expired. Let me say in closing that you misrepresent the interest of the farmers in attempting the crush the manufacture of oleomargarine. Every article that goes into oleomargarine is raised upon the farm, and it is raised, not by the factory farmer, but by the farmer who works the land.

I stand here to represent the farmer as I have known him. I represent the farmer, who follows the plow in the early spring. I represent the farmer, who sits for fourteen long hours under the July sun riding the mower to the monotonous music of the vibrating sickle. I represent the farmer, who goes out in the cold days of the early winter with chapped and bleeding hands to pull the yellow corn from the stubborn stalk. I represent the farmer, who goes out in storm and tempest to feed and care for the cattle upon whose lives he is practically dependent for an existence. I represent the farmer, who is to-day the hardest-worked and poorest-paid man in these United States. I represent the farmer, whose day of labor knows no eight-hour limit, but begins with the rising sun and ends too often under the light of the silvery moon. I know the hard conditions under which he lives and labors and the small remuneration he receives for his toil. I deny your right to take from him a single dollar of his hard-earned money to give it to the creamery and the dairy man, who is to-day the most prosperous individual who carries on any business connected with the soil of these United States. [Applause.]

In the interest of the true farmer, in the interest of the farmer who farms the land and not the farmer who farms the farmer; in the interest of the farmer who works with the soil and not the farmer who works with the machinery in the creamery; in his interest and in the interest of 20,000,000 of people living to-day in cities of the United States of more than 25,000 population, cities that can not depend upon the country butter, but must depend upon the creamery and the oleomargarine factory, aye, in the interest of the laboring man, who is dependent on this product for the fats that are necessary in his dietary; in the interest of honest labor, whether on the farm or in the factory, whether in the field or at the forge, I protest against this iniquitous and unjust legislation. [Applause.]

I desire to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the RECORD section 6 of the substitute offered by the minority, which I believe will effectually stop the fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, and which I think is as far as this House ought or has the right to go.

SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word "Oleomargarine" in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with a paper wrapper with the word "Oleomargarine" printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word "Oleomargarine" printed thereon in distinct letters, and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word "Oleomargarine," with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2 pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be, at all times, so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirements of this act.

Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine otherwise than as provided by this act, or contrary to the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made in pursuance hereof, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who shall sell or offer for sale, as butter, any oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for the first offense not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and for the second and every subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than sixty days nor more than two years.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this measure (H. R. 9206) now under consideration is to provide the best means of protecting the public against imposition in the sale of oleomargarine in the guise and under the name of butter, and to give to the producer of the genuine article an open market to which he is justly entitled. A measure very similar in character passed this House in the last session of Congress, and I assume the present bill will receive like treatment. If it was important then, it is quite as important now; and although the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Grout, whose name gave title to the last bill and whose patient labor did so much to open the way for its consideration and passage, is, unfortunately, no longer a member of this House, yet he has left behind him a coterie of coworkers who will see that his labors be not in vain.

Mr. Chairman, the present bill is, I think, an improvement upon its predecessor, in that it increases the tax on imitation butter to 10 cents per pound and reduces the tax on oleomargarine, free from ingredients that make it look like butter, from one-half to one-fourth cent per pound. The character of the bill is also improved by the addition of section 2, which must prevent unscrupulous dealers, hotel proprietors, and restaurant and boarding-house keepers from coloring the manufactured article.

For more than twenty years these unscrupulous purveyors have been deceiving their customers, whose order for butter has been answered with a piece of colored oleomargarine; but under this bill dishonest caterers can neither purchase the imitation for less price than good butter commands, nor can they color it themselves without paying the 10 cents tax. This provision must necessarily cut off one source of the great demand for the imitation article, since the restaurant and boarding house are large consumers of the spurious product. A tax of 10 cents a pound makes it equivalent to the price of good butter. So that hereafter if colored oleomargarine is served it will be, as the committee says, "because it is better and not because it is cheaper than butter." This tax is drastic, but it is to prevent fraud, not to raise revenue. Thus far, dealers have manifested a disposition to resist or evade reasonable restrictions. It is now proposed to surround the traffic with such regulations that evasion is impossible and resistance of no avail.

The fourth section of the bill, in my opinion, greatly strengthens it, also, since it not only compels wholesale dealers to keep such books as the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue may require, and to keep them open to the inspection of his agents, but it provides proper penalty for its violation. It is similar, as I understand it, to the fourth section of the act of 1890, except that it adds a penalty for its violation, thus making it stronger than the law of 1886, which provides no penalty for failure or refusal of wholesale dealers to permit an examination of their books. These two new provisions—sections 2 and 4—ought to put an end to the dishonest methods now in vogue among dealers in oleomargarine.

Recent investigations disclose the fact that uncolored oleomargarine can be easily and quickly colored without melting or apparent injury to the product. Heretofore this has been denied. In the debate one year ago it was claimed that color must be added at the time of its manufacture, otherwise the product would be materially injured, if not absolutely destroyed; but we now know that after it has left the honest manufacturer and the honest dealer, the uncolored article, without trouble and with trifling expense, can be changed by the dishonest retailer or unscrupulous purveyor into the rich yellow of creamery butter without the slightest harm to the product, and resold or put upon the table as a superior quality of butter worth 20 to 25 cents per pound. Against such a fraud only the most stringent measures will protect the producers and consumers of butter.

For this reason the pending bill burdens the counterfeit or imitative article with a tax sufficient, it is believed, to take away the incentive to fraud. A pound of uncolored oleomargarine, costing 14 cents, can be colored and sold as butter for 24 cents; but when so treated it must pay a tax of 10 cents, an equivalent of the entire profit. This, as I have said, is an enormous tax, but experience teaches that it is absolutely necessary in order successfully to correct the flagrant abuses accompanying its sale.

Recent investigations have disclosed the fact, also, that it is possible to build up an honest, legitimate trade for the uncolored article. The cry of the manufacturers has been that the passage of a bill similar to the one pending would ruin the entire oleomargarine business, throwing hundreds of people out of employment, and withholding the product from those who are unable to purchase butter. This plea has had its effect.

Members of this House do not want to destroy business, or reduce employment, or enhance the price of necessities, and it is gratifying to know, what many have heretofore believed, but could not prove to the satisfaction of all, that leading manufacturers now testify that if the colored article is suppressed it is possible to build up a substantial demand for the uncolored product. A prominent dealer stated to the Committee on Agriculture, no longer ago than last month, that a large proportion of the output of his factory is not only uncolored but is being sold in its original condition and color to people who desire it as a cheap substitute for butter. This statement is corroborated by a well-known State official whose duty it is to know the condition of the trade as it exists to-day, so that the committee does not hesitate to declare that with the uncolored article out of the field a legitimate, substantial trade can, in course of time, be built up.

And why, Mr. Chairman, should such a trade not be builded into large proportions? If, as the friends of oleomargarine claim, it is made from the cleanest materials in the cleanest manner possible; if it is as wholesome as butter and much superior to the cheaper grades; if people want it because it is cheaper and better than cheap butter; if all these claims are true, what prevents the upbuilding of a great trade in the uncolored or unadulterated article? Either the manufacturers are not sincere in their claims or they are unwilling to forego the enormous profit derived from its sale as butter.

I doubt if people appreciate how profitable it is. For the year ending June 30, 1899, there were produced in the United States 91,322,260 pounds of oleomargarine at an average cost for materials of 7.09 cents per pound. Now, add to this one-half cent per pound for packing, 1 cent per pound for manufacturing, 2 cents a pound for internal-revenue tax, and the finished product costs an average of 10.59 cents per pound. This product is quoted from 11¼ cents for lowest grade to 18 cents for highest quality, averaging probably 14 cents per pound, thus yielding an average profit of nearly 25 per cent.

Is it any wonder that dealers and manufacturers of oleomargarine resent and oppose the provisions of this bill? But what does it do? Simply demands honest methods in its sale—that is all. No one objects to its manufacture and sale; no one objects to people buying or selling or eating it. This is their privilege. But when people color it in imitation of butter, so that it is sold for butter, used for butter, and eaten for butter, this bill calls it a fraud and puts about it barriers and restrictions and punishments.

Counterfeit butter and cheese are on a par with counterfeit money. A man pays 25 cents for a pound of butter, and the manufacturer or dealer who gives him a pound of oleomargarine is little better than the man who pays for the alleged butter with a counterfeit quarter of a dollar. It is no excuse to say that the oleomargarine is as good as butter, or as clean as butter, or as wholesome as butter, or as nutritious as butter, any more than the counterfeiter can say that his quarter is as heavy, or as pure, or intrinsically as valuable as a genuine quarter.

Oleomargarine is not butter any more than counterfeit money is money. But it is hard to stop counterfeiting. The skill and ingenuity of the Secret Service Bureau, assisted by the most carefully studied statutes, are constantly required, and yet new counterfeits are continually appearing. Its profitableness is a great incentive. Experience teaches that it is equally difficult to stop the sale of imitation butter. Twenty-two States, having four-fifths of the entire population of the country, forbid its manufacture and sale, and these laws have been upheld in the highest court of States and of the United States, yet the business still goes on. Should the pending bill ever become a law, however, it will compel the dishonest manufacturer and dealer to become as skillful as the illegal distillers of whisky if they continue in the business.

Section 4 of this measure, in fact, puts the manufacture of oleomargarine on an equality with the distillation of whisky so far as concerns bookkeeping and book inspection. It reads as follows:

That wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall keep such books and render such returns in relation thereto as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, by regulation, require; and such books shall be open at all times to the inspection of any internal-revenue officer or agent. And any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this section shall for each such offense be fined not less than $50 and not exceeding $500 and imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

That this section makes the pending bill much more effective than the measure offered a year ago is evident by the resistance it has met before the committee. By means of it every pound of oleomargarine manufactured in the country can be traced from dealer to dealer, thus making detection of the sale of the yellow article for butter much easier than before.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed that oleomargarine is substantially a product of milk, and these claims have been repeated and the story retold so often that many well-meaning people have come to accept it as true; but the following table shows that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, in an output of 91,322,260 pounds there were used only 14,200,576 pounds of milk, 1,568,319 pounds of butter, and 3,527,410 pounds of cream, or 21.13 per cent of the whole amount. In other words, nearly 80 per cent of the year's product was made up of lard, oils, glycerin, sugar, and other foreign substances.

Quantity, character, and value of ingredients used in the production of oleomargarine for the year ending June 30, 1899, also percentage each ingredient bears to the whole quantity.

The minority report of the Committee on Agriculture place much reliance upon the opinions of expert and well-known chemists that oleomargarine is a wholesome and nutritious article of food. They quote from Prof. C. F. Chandler, of Columbia College, New York, who says:

I have studied the question of its use as food, in comparison with the ordinary butter made from cream, and have satisfied myself that it is quite as valuable as the butter from the cow. The product is palatable and wholesome, and I regard it as a most valuable article of food.

Prof. George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania, says:

Butterine is, in my opinion, quite as valuable as a nutritive agent as butter itself. It is perfectly wholesome and is desirable as an article of food. I can see no reason why butterine should not be an entirely satisfactory equivalent for ordinary butter, whether considered from the physiological or commercial standpoint.

A dozen other learned college men are quoted, all of whom express similar opinions. But from what source came the oleomargarine of this test? Was it made purposely for the laboratory?

That these gentlemen are honest, skillful, and able no one doubts. But what would they say of the article taken at random from the supply offered for sale in the grocery stores and placed upon the tables of restaurants and boarding houses? In July, 1899, samples of oleomargarine taken from stores in New York and Brooklyn were found to contain 10 per cent of paraffin. In other words, a 60-pound tub of oleomargarine would contain 6 pounds of paraffin, "a substance," says the president of the National Dairy Union, "which the strongest acids are unable to affect." One of the uses of paraffin is to protect bronze and marble statues from the weather. As a food product it is absolutely indigestible.

Among the articles named in the patents granted for the manufacture of substitute butter are borax, cotton-seed oil, bicarbonate of soda, alum, glycerin, sulphuric acid, tallow, cornstarch, caustic potash, castor oil, chalk, slippery-elm bark, olive oil, turnip-seed oil, chlorate of potash, oil of peanuts, nitrate of soda, stomach of pigs, nitric acid, mustard-seed oil, sugar, caustic soda, and bicarbonate of potash. It is possible that so-called "neutral grease," when subjected to these acids and alkalies, may be wholesome butter, but, "leading scientists" to the contrary, 32 States, having over 60,000,000 people, have prohibited such deodorized grease from being colored in imitation of butter and sold in the market.

It is no secret that butter fat, found in the milk of all mammals, is the natural food of infant offspring, having the most delicate of all digestion, and that milk and its butter product are among the most healthful and important articles of food. The young, the sick, the old—everybody can use them with the least possible harm. Butter melts at 92 degrees, and the normal heat of the human stomach is 98 degrees. Naturally this fat, taken in its raw state into the stomach, will digest easily and imperceptibly. Nature so intended.

On the other hand, oleomargarine melts at a temperature varying from 102° to 106°, "a temperature," says ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, "which no healthful stomach ever attains. As a consequence, this unnatural foreign fat must be expelled by sheer gastric action and force." When stearin, of which candles are made, or paraffin, whose use has already been indicated, is added, in order to make the cotton-seed oil stand up like butter, the digestible character of the mixture may well be doubted. Possibly strong men whose work keeps them out of doors ten or twelve hours a day may be able to dispose of it without injury, but men of sedentary habits and people with delicate stomachs can not use it with umpunity.

The fact that inferior qualities of butter are colored and sold as a superior quality does not make it right to color and sell oleomargarine as butter. A reprehensible practice in the sale of butter is no excuse for the perpetration of a fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, nor does it extenuate or lessen the fraud because oleomargarine may be a clean food product and capable of use as a substitute for butter. Such suggestions are unworthy the gentlemen making them.

Mr. Chairman, admitting all that is claimed for oleomargarine as a food product, the fact remains, as appears from the reports, that its ready sale is dependent almost entirely upon its imitation of butter. The author of this bill is authority for the statement that not one pound in a million of colored oleomargarine is bought and eaten by the consumer for what it is. The dealer may know its true character, and hotel and restaurant keepers and other customers may have purchased it with the same information, but those, as a rule, who eat it do so believing it to be butter. It is put up like butter, served like butter, and colored like butter, while its taste, unfamiliar to the consumer because butter is never present for comparison, may not disclose its character.

The principle involved in this measure is one of common everyday honesty. It is only when manufacturers and venders of oleomargarine seek to dispose of it for what it is not that the people are aroused and the lawmakers invoked, and for one I believe the time has come when those engaged in the traffic should be taught by drastic measures to respect the rights of others and to do business under honest methods. Hence I am in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, no stronger arraignment of this bill and no more forcible denunciation of its vice and impolicy could be formulated than that which was expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his remarks delivered in this Chamber on last Friday upon the report of the Committee on Rules fixing a time for its consideration. I quote a few words from his speech:

> I believe that at the root of this bill and this proposition lies a menace to the liberties of this country and an assault upon personal rights and freedom. It is a proposition to introduce into the forum of Congress a measure to permit the taxing power of the United States Government (when there is no necessity for raising funds) to be used for the purpose of destroying a great industry, and by consequence building up another industry. It is a simple attempt of the strong to crush the weak. It is a misdirection of Government power and purpose that may be used in the coming years for the overthrow of any other industry of this country. There is not an industrial right enjoyed by a citizen of the United States that may not be in this way assailed and overthrown by a merciless, corrupt, and wicked purpose.

This is, indeed, multum in parvo. It exposes the evil and admonishes of the danger of such legislation as is here proposed. It would be a difficult thing, if not impossible, to compress in as few words more of good sense, sound political philosophy, and timely warning than he has thus done. I cordially approve what he has said and commend his utterance to the careful consideration of both sides of this House. It will surely receive the attention of thoughtful people throughout the country.

This bill is indefensible upon any principle of justice, necessity, or propriety. It is a naked proposition to invoke the strong arm of the law to interfere as between rival domestic industries, in favor of the one and against the other. It invites the taxing power to destroy or cripple one competitive enterprise in order to upbuild another. However we may differ concerning a protective tariff when applied to articles imported from a foreign country, it must be conceded that there is, to say the least, both decency and dignity in the contention that imposts should be so regulated as to prevent an injurious competition between cheap foreign labor and that of our working people at home, and we can not withhold our respect from those who conscientiously advocate such a policy.

There is no semblance of affinity between that contention and such a purpose as is contemplated by this bill. Butter and oleomargarine are domestic products, manufactured by our own people. Home labor is employed in making the one, the same as the other. Our home markets and the by-products of the farm and ranch are vitally interested. Our foreign relations and external economic policies are not involved. In my conception it is a perversion and a prostitution of one of the powers of government, intended to be exercised only for wise and salutary reasons and for the accomplishment of distinctively legitimate objects, and a resort to which under normal conditions is only justified on the ground of necessity, to employ it for a purely selfish purpose and to uphold by force of law an industry which confesses its inability to contend with its local rival in an open field and a fair struggle.

Once establish this policy, once give it legislative sanction, and easy will be the descent to every sort of special favoritism, interposition by Congress for the benefit of classes, unjustifiable legal interference with the business affairs of our own citizens and impairment or destruction of any pursuit or enterprise which may have a formidable competitor. As Mr. GROSVENOR so well says, "It is a misdirection of Government power and purpose that may be used in the coming years for the overthrow of any other industry of this country." Can we afford to establish such a precedent, and thus begin a downward course? I conjure my colleagues on this side of the House, to hearken to the admonition of this eminent Republican statesman. He speaks the words of truth and soberness, and what he says is worthy of our most serious reflection. I beg you to—

> Seize upon truth wherever found,
> Among your friends, among your foes;
> Upon our own or foreign ground,
> The flower's divine, where'er it grows.

It is apparent to everyone that there is no necessity for the passage of this bill because of any revenue to be derived from its operations. We do not need the revenue that would result. Our Treasury is now filled to overflowing. Propositions are pending to reduce taxes, to remove the exactions demanded by our recent war, rather than to provide for additional levies. There is an utter absence of justification on this ground, nor can the advocates of the bill for a moment candidly insist that it is supported for any other reason save that of hostility to a competing industry.

No consideration of public health inspires this measure, for confessedly the ingredients of oleomargarine are clean, nutritious, and wholesome, and as a food product it is healthful and useful. It enters into the dietary of vast numbers of our people, and no complaint is urged that its use is deleterious to its consumers. Its constituent elements are health-promoting rather than health-impairing. It enables many families to have habitually upon their tables victuals at a moderate cost that their means would not allow if its manufacture should cease and its sale should be driven from the field of commerce.

In addition to these things, when we reflect upon the extent of the damage that would result to so many of our people if this bill should become a law, how it would affect our farmers who grow cotton and raise hogs, our ranchmen whose time and investments are devoted to the cattle industry, the many laboring people who find employment, and others who are supplied with a food product they can afford to enjoy, it is almost incomprehensible that it should be seriously advocated in this great body of lawgivers. I can not believe that the American Congress will so far depart from correct principle and so abuse the taxing power of this Government as to enact it into law.

Knowing the great interest my people take in opposition to this bill and realizing how harmful it would be to them, and regarding it as dangerous and vicious in policy as it would be hurtful in practice, I feel it to be my duty to resist its passage as far as it may be within my power to do. It is estimated by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas that the defeat of the legislation here proposed means an annual saving to the State of Texas alone of at least $10,000,000. To what extent it would affect other States I am not prepared to say.

Mr. Chairman, we have had adverse conditions with which to contend all over our Southern country; we have endured much and had many obstacles to overcome; but we have struggled on and hoped on, depending upon ourselves and trusting in the sense of justice of our fellow-men and legislative bodies to see to it that no unreasonable restrictions or unnecessary burdens should be imposed upon us. We have accomplished much, but there is more to be done, and we are ready for all the work our hands may find to do. All that we need or ask is a fair start and an equal show in the race of life.

The hope of this comes to us like a glory-beaming star from the dark clouds of the past. It gives us joyful assurance of the dawn of a better day. It tells us that we shall have every suitable opportunity for development and expansion. It assures us that the materials which abound among us will invite the capital which seeks investment from all parts of the country, that mills and factories shall be established in all our region, that markets for our products shall be furnished at our very doors, that employment shall be afforded for all who desire to work—whether in the field or at the forge, on the farm or in the factory—that industrial progress shall be stimulated to the highest degree, and prosperity shall gladden the hearts of all our people in all the walks of life. Let nothing be done by the Congress of the United States that will discourage this hope, stand in the way of our onward march, or retard in any degree the mighty achievements that lie out before us. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KNAPP. Mr. Chairman, this bill which has been reported by a majority of the Committee on Agriculture and is now being considered has for its main purposes the better protection of the agricultural and dairy industries, and also the consumers of the country. As such it has my unqualified approval and support.

Such approval and support, however, are not based upon any desire to either promote class legislation or give undue protection to one legitimate industry over that of another. Neither are they prompted by any considerations of the bill as a revenue measure; but they are based upon a belief and conviction that every desirable and legitimate industry in this country resting upon its own merits and not clothed in disguise should receive from the General Government as far as is possible that fostering care and protection which will tend to promote their development and prosperity.

The agricultural industry is concededly a legitimate industry. Further, it is concededly one of if not the most important industries of the nation. Of our population over 13,000,000 are engaged in agricultural pursuits. We have, in round numbers, about 6,000,000 farms. The value of the farmers' annual product is nearly $5,000,000,000. These facts, so familiar to all, make possible and emphasize the truth of the statement that in the United States agriculture, in the aggregate of all its varied branches, is a master industry.

Now, while we can not point to the prosperity of any one of our many and diversified industries as indicating a general prosperity, we can, perhaps, more nearly point to this industry as indicating such prosperity. When fortune favors the farmer, commerce gives more nearly to every breeze its sails; business of every kind more nearly thrives and flourishes; but when adversity visits him, folded away are many of the sails of commerce; dull and languid are many of the marts of business. Thus, upon this one industry are dependent, in a sense and to a remarkable extent, many of the manifold industries of the nation.

But the most important branch of agriculture, the one that more nearly than all others fixes its condition in this country, is the dairy industry. The capital invested in dairy stock and the sum received for the milk, butter, and cheese produced are among the greatest investments and receipts connected with agriculture. Dairying is the prime factor of this industry, and it is so closely connected with the fortunes of agriculture that whatever depresses this branch depresses the whole industry, and whatever advances the prosperity of this branch advances the prosperity of the whole industry.

Now, the supporters of this bill believe and affirm that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as to-day carried on works injury to the dairy, and particularly to the butter, industry of the country. This belief rests upon certain facts, to which I will hereafter refer, and which, in my judgment, confirm such belief. If this is not correct, then both public sentiment and law have gone radically wrong upon this subject. It may be argued that public sentiment and law are not always correct. If that be said to be true, and it may be, it is nevertheless equally true that they do not long remain wrong, and in this case and upon this question both public sentiment and law have so often been declared and confirmed that it can not be assumed they have gone wrong.

Thirty-two of the States of the Union have, and many of them for some time have had, laws prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter and regulating the sale of the product, and while these laws differ in statutory requirements and effect, they are in the main restrictive, and were enacted for the avowed purpose to better protect the butter industries and the consumers of these several States.

The State of New York, one of the greatest agricultural States in the Union, has a law not only prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter, but making it an offense to have the same in possession or for sale. That law was passed by the legislature and signed by the governor as the expressed will of the people of that Commonwealth. Pennsylvania, another great agricultural State, has also a statute prohibiting the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine and regulating the sale in its natural state or color, so restrictive in its provisions as to be declared by the opponents of this bill to be all but prohibitive of the oleomargarine industry. But that law is the voice of Pennsylvania on this subject.

But suffice it to say that 32 of the States, with an aggregate population of over 63,000,000 of people, have statutory enactments prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter, and regulating its sale in its natural state and color. Thus, the people of two-thirds of the States, through their accredited representatives, the several legislatures, have passed upon this subject and have declared in favor of protecting the butter industry to the extent that it shall not be jeopardized by a competitor manufactured in imitation and sold in disguise, and protecting the consumers to the extent that they shall at least know what they get, consume, and pay for. These facts evidence both the importance and public sentiment which attaches to this proposed legislation.

But, say the opponents of this bill, these several State laws are unwise, unjust, and wrong. If that be so, why have not some of these laws been repealed? (None of them have been repealed except where found unconstitutional, and in such cases have been replaced with laws equally restrictive of the oleomargarine industry.) A great authority once said, "The best way to repeal a bad law is to execute it." The proper authorities in these several States have tried, not always with success, however, to execute these laws, and what laws have been repealed except those above referred to as unconstitutional? It is not fair or just to assume that the people of these several States are so far wrong on this subject that they can not be right. These laws are upon the statute books because they are just and right laws, and because they represent the wish and will of the people of the several States.

Further than all this, the constitutionality of many of these existing laws has been confirmed by State courts, and the power and right of the several States to enact and execute such laws has been confirmed by the highest judicial authority, the Supreme Court of the United States. That was the effect of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Plumley vs. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461). In rendering the decision in that case, Justice Harlan said:

> We are of the opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its markets any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may by reason of such coloration or adulteration cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public. The States are as competent to protect their people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of more serious character, and this protection may be given without violating any right secured by the National Constitution and without infringing the authority of the General Government. A State enactment forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food in general use among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to the citizens of the United States.

This decision by the highest judicial tribunal in the Republic sets at rest all question as to the right of the several States to enact such laws as will protect their citizens against the manufacture and sale and use of an article in imitation of a genuine food product.

So this subject is not new either to legislative councils or to the courts. It is a subject which, not only in the present but for fully fifteen years of the past, has deeply interested the people of this country. It is a subject upon which 32 of the States and also the Congress of the United States have already legislated, and upon the legality of which legislation State courts and the Supreme Court of the United States have already passed judgment. Thus, this bill does not come as a new or revolutionary measure in legislation.

But what are the provisions of this bill, and what do they seek to effect? The first section of the bill provides that all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, or imitation butter or cheese, or any kind of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk and cream, transported into a State or Territory and remaining there for consumption or sale, shall be subject to the laws of such State or Territory. This section is only confirmatory of the right already assumed by and guaranteed to the States by the decision of the Supreme Court above cited. What reasonable objection can be made to that? It does not change the letter of any existing State law. It does not take from or add to any State statutory enactment. It simply confirms the States in the right to continue, add to, or repeal present laws, and should, in my judgment, receive our unqualified approval.

Another provision of the bill, and a most important one, provides that uncolored oleomargarine shall be taxed one-fourth of 1 cent per pound, and that oleomargarine, colored in imitation of butter, shall be taxed 10 cents per pound. That provision is amendatory of the law passed by Congress in 1886, in that it reduces the tax on the uncolored product from 2 cents per pound, as provided in that law, to one-fourth of a cent per pound, and also adds the tax of 10 cents a pound on oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter. If any effective criticism can be passed upon that provision, it is in the fact that it reduces the tax on the uncolored product, and not upon the fact that it adds a tax of 10 cents a pound on the product colored in imitation of butter.

The real purpose for imposing this tax is to compel it to be manufactured, sold, and consumed, if at all, for just what it is. If that tax is, as is claimed by some engaged in the oleomargarine industry, prohibitive, then it is prohibitive because the industry can not stand upon its own merits. If legislation compelling oleomargarine to be manufactured, sold, and consumed for just what it is, and not for what it is not, means the destruction of that industry, then it invites its own destruction. If that industry can not exist except in imitation, fraud, and deceit, then it does not deserve to exist at all, and the sooner it is stopped the better. The imposition of this tax of 10 cents a pound is not, in its resultant effects, aimed at oleomargarine in its natural state and color, but at oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter. It is this which makes it in the markets so injurious a competitor of genuine butter.

It is stated that during the past year there was manufactured and sold in this country of oleomargarine 104,000,000 pounds. Probably much more was manufactured and sold of which there is no record. But, however that may be, certainly a very large per cent of the 104,000,000 pounds was colored in imitation of butter. It is stated, on apparently good authority, that this 104,000,000 pounds was sold at an average profit of 12 cents a pound, thus showing the profits of this industry for the brief period of one year to be over $12,000,000. Such were the enormous profits realized largely because this article was manufactured, sold, and consumed in imitation of butter. Impose this tax of 10 cents a pound and you so reduce the profits that the main incentive for the fraud and taking the chances of perpetrating it is gone, and if that tax should not be sufficient to accomplish the desired result, then further enactments should impose a still higher tax.

What chance do the thousands of farmers throughout the country, possessing but a few acres of land and a small number of cows, following their honorable avocation to support and possibly leave a little to their loved ones—what chance do these farmers stand against competitors reaping their profits by millions? They would soon be at the mercy of such competitors and should be protected from the ruinous results of such competition. That is one of the main purposes of this provision of the bill which merits careful consideration and universal approval. One of the arguments against this provision is that an industry should not be taxed out of existence. That depends entirely upon what kind of an industry it is. If it be an industry resting upon its own merits and not dependent upon fraud for its continuance and success, then, of course, it should not be taxed out of existence. But if it be an industry clothed in disguise and dependent upon its imitation of the genuine to perpetuate it, then it should be taxed to the extent that will strip it of the disguises, even if it results in ending its existence. Better, far better, tax a product thriving on imitation out of existence than to allow that product, by unfair competition, to ruin an honest and legitimate industry.

But we are told with such persistency and emphasis that oleomargarine is a palatable, healthy food product, and this claim is said to be established by obtained opinions from experts and chemists. Now, as to its palatable and health-giving qualities, if such it has, I do not know, never having knowingly departed from the good, honest, unadulterated production of the dairy. Further than all this, I do not consider it necessary to pass upon that question. The vital question affecting the purpose of this legislation is that it is an article in imitation of a genuine product. That fact alone is sufficient to confirm the suspicion that its health-giving qualities are not over well founded, and certainly that, whether healthy or unhealthy as a product, in the manner of its manufacture and sale it is unhealthy to morals.

There is deceit all along the line, from the coloring vat of the manufacturer to the shop windows of the too-willing dealers in the various villages and cities of this country, who display oleomargarine brickbats under creamery labels, and from these to thousands of unsuspecting consumers. From the laboratory of the factory, from the hands of the expert chemist, who models his dyes from the specimens of pure, rich, creamery butter furnished him for the purpose, come the "spring coloring," the "June coloring," the "October coloring," at the order of the dealer in the proper season. Now, if oleomargarine is so good, so health giving, so nourishing, and so sweet, if it is such a delightful substance that babies cry for it and old people live only to enjoy it, then why this fraud and deceit all along the line? Why not manufacture, sell, and consume it for just what it is? It is largely a product produced and disposed of in fraud of a genuine. I am for this bill because it will protect the consumers through the country in getting what they pay for, use, and consume, and will protect the honest butter industry from the unjust competition of an imitation product.

The claim that the limited amount of oleomargarine manufactured and sold does not really affect the butter industry is not well founded. There was manufactured during the past year of butter about 1,500,000,000 pounds, about 800,000,000 pounds of which found its way into the markets, the balance going to home consumption and export, and there was manufactured of oleomargarine 104,000,000 pounds which found its way into the markets. That 104,000,000 pounds displaced just so much of the genuine product of butter, and if this be allowed to continue the amount of colored oleomargarine would rapidly increase, and the years would be but few before its dishonest competition would cripple, if not ruin, the butter industry of the country.

But, again, it is claimed by the friends of the oleomargarine industry that this bill would work injury to the laboring people. I give place to no man in my loyalty to the welfare of the laboring people. They are enabling us to carve out the triumphs of American industries. They and their welfare should have our careful thought and best efforts. This bill would, in my judgment, work a distinct benefit to the laboring people, and that is an added reason why it has my approval and support.

But not to discuss further in detail the provisions of this bill, considered in its broader sense it is a measure the purpose of which is not to stifle but to protect legitimate and undisguised industry. To do this is a wise and judicious exercise of legislative power. Our past record, present prosperity, and future welfare all depend upon a wise working out of industrial problems and a judicious protection of legitimate industries. American industry and the products of that industry are finding a market the world over, and among the very greatest factors in all this is the agricultural industry. We are, so to speak, feeding the nations of the world. During the year that has just passed we exported about $1,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and of this England, our best customer, took four hundred millions; Germany, one hundred and thirty millions; France, forty-five millions, and other foreign nations the balance. If we are to continue to lead the world in these products and command the markets by their superior quality, then we must, by wise legislative enactments, foster and protect every branch of this master industry.

The State of New York, imperial in its population, and largely so in its industries, cherishing, as do the other States, a just pride in the heroic deeds of her soldier citizens, cherishes also her conquest of peace. In the front rank of these are her conquests in the pursuits of agriculture, which have made her one of the greatest agricultural States of the Union. The number of her dairy cows aggregates about 1,500,000, a number greater in the aggregate than that of any other State. The cheese produced during the season of 1900 aggregated about 126,000,000 pounds, an amount, I think, greater than that of any other Commonwealth. The butter produced during the same season aggregated nearly 40,000,000 pounds. Thus, in the prime factor of agriculture, the dairy industry, she is one of the leading States. But she leads not alone in this, but also in protecting the dairy industry and the consumers of dairy products. Voicing the will of the people the legislature annually appropriates $100,000 for the purpose of protecting from imitation and adulteration food products, and of that $100,000 $60,000 is used to enforce and carry out the laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored in imitation of butter, and protecting dairy products. That is the treatment given to this imitation industry and fraudulent product by the people of that Commonwealth. That is the way New York protects alike her butter industry and her consumers.

The district I have the honor to represent is an important factor in the agricultural industry of the Empire State. During the season of 1900 there was produced in that district, of cheese manufactured in factories in the aggregate about 27,000,000 pounds, not including homemade, and of butter manufactured in factories in the aggregate about 550,000 pounds, not including homemade. Thus it is one of the largest dairy districts in that Commonwealth. Of the population of the district a goodly proportion are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and, while they are not possessed of all the prosperity that I would wish and hope for them, still, as the result of industry and economy, they are advanciug the welfare of their chosen pursuit. They do not ask that any blow be struck at honest labor. They do not ask the destruction of any legitimate industry resting upon its own merits and not clothed in disguise.

But they do ask and demand that this so-called oleomargarine industry, carried on in imitation and fraud, shall not be allowed to strike a ruinous blow at their undisguised and honest industry. They do demand that the legitimate rewards of their honest toil, which is their dependence for the present and will be in their declining years, shall not be taken from them by unjust and ruinous competition. With these demands I am in most hearty sympathy and, voicing their united will and also my own judgment, I give my voice, influence, and vote for this bill.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, the farming and dairying interests are among the most important of any in which the people of Erie and Crawford counties, which compose the Twenty-sixth district of Pennsylvania, are engaged. Almost every farmer's family is to some extent interested in the manufacture and sale of butter. It is because the welfare of the farmer affects all other interests, and in fact the general welfare of the whole country, that I am in favor of this bill.

It is a bill in the interest of fair play. It is a bill to prevent fraud and to compel manufacturers of oleomargarine to sell their product for what it is. The most earnest speeches in opposition to this measure seem to be pleas for large profits—for unjust profits. Two articles are in competition, two articles of different value, of different component parts, and this bill seeks to compel each article to be sold on its own merits. It is not designed to destroy any industry. The gentlemen on the other side are continually asserting that it will eliminate or legislate out of existence a legitimate industry.

I call your attention, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, to the testimony of Mr. Tillingast, the president of one of the oleomargarine manufactories, adduced before the committee, that he believed it possible to build up a demand for the uncolored article, provided that colored oleomargarine was not a competitor in price. Another manufacturer testified that a large proportion of the output of his factory is uncolored, and not made in imitation of butter. It would seem, therefore, that the claims made that the passage of this bill will kill the entire oleomargarine business are not the result of well-founded fears of the loss of patronage, but from a desire to be permitted to continue to produce an article with a large profit in its sale, which can only be made and sold in defiance or evasion of the laws of the majority of our States. If any desire a cheap substitute for butter let them purchase the uncolored article, but let the counterfeit article no longer be accessible to consumers at such prices that there will be an inducement to deceive and practice imposition so that people will not be able to know whether they are eating butter when they spread their bread.

The gentleman from Missouri, who preceded me, seems very solicitous and apprehensive lest some rule or legislation shall be passed by this House which will in some way interfere with or infringe upon what he conceives to be the right of local self-government. Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill is in the interest of local self-government. Thirty-two States in this country have passed laws, some of them most stringent in their character, to protect their citizens from fraud and deceit in the sale of oleomargarine. This bill is intended to, and I believe will, strengthen and supplement the wise and wholesome laws passed by the legislatures of these several States. This bill makes the "original package" of oleomargarine shipped into Pennsylvania or any other State, at once upon its arrival, subject to the operation and effect of the laws of Pennsylvania or such State or Territory into which it is shipped in the same manner as if such oleomargarine had been produced therein. Not to pass this bill is in effect to aid and assist in breaking down local self-government in the several States, while, on the other hand, to pass it is to assist and make uniform the application of the very spirit and essence of these State laws now in force and upon the statute books.

The National Grange of this country, an organization of thirty-five years' standing, which has subordinate branches in forty of the States of this Union, and which represents in actual membership over half a million farmers of the United States, asks for the passage of this bill. This organization is composed of all classes of men engaged in agriculture, dairying, stock raising, either on a large or small scale. They are the only national society of farmers in the United States. They are entirely nonpartisan in their organization, being established for the purpose of promoting the interests of agriculture. They ask for this legislation because they believe it to be for the best interest of all the people of this country that every article of food product shall be put upon the market and sold for what it is and not for what it may seem to be or represent in appearance. They believe that their incomes have already become too much reduced by reason of the products of their farms being placed in competition with adulterated, colored, and fraudulent articles made in imitation of the honest product by unscrupulous, money-making adventurers.

This bill is substantially the same as the measure introduced in the last Congress, known as the "Grout bill," and which failed to become a law. It is a revenue measure; but its main object is to regulate the sale and use of oleomargarine and to prevent fraud. It was stated by Governor Hoard before the committee that 90 per cent of the entire product of oleomargarine in this country is sold fraudulently. The tax of 10 cents per pound on the colored article, together with the slight tax on the uncolored article and the provision that upon being shipped into any State it becomes at once amenable to the laws of that State, will enable the manufacturers of this product to sell it only for what it is, and subject to the tax and license imposed by local laws. I shall for these reasons give my support and vote to this measure. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. DAVIDSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the speeches on this question, and especially to those portions of the remarks of several of the advocates and opponents of this measure, in which they explain their positions on grounds of business interests in their several districts. Now, I confess, although it may convict me of lack of intelligence, that I believe in this bill and support it because I do honestly believe in it, and I live in a city of 110,000 people, where there are many labor organizations. [Loud applause.] I stand for it not only for the farmers from that district, but for many members of the labor unions in the city of Syracuse. Mechanics and laborers are sensible men, and when they order and pay for genuine butter, either in a grocery or at the table of a boardinghouse or hotel, they want butter and not an imitation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin said he believed in and stood by this measure because he wanted to stop the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in imitation of butter, and he would vote for this tax for that purpose. I will go him one better, and if 10 cents a pound will not stop its manufacture and sale as butter I would make it 20 cents a pound and vote for it. [Derisive jeers on the Democratic side.] In other words, I want to stop the fraud and counterfeit, and would vote for any tax necessary to stop its manufacture and sale, if colored like butter.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman says he is going to vote for it because labor organizations in his city advocate it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I did not say they advocate it. They do not oppose it. Not one has said a word to me about it.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman was a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress, I know. I will ask him whether he did not receive communications from labor organizations opposing this measure?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think not; and furthermore, I have mixed up with those people for the last two years and none of them has said a word to me about it.

Mr. WACHTER. Well, the gentleman from New York seems to be a very bad mixer. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. That may be, but I am very well acquainted with the labor organizations of our city. Now, one other point. The gentlemen who oppose this bill say they are in favor of preventing fraud in the manufacture and sale of this article. The friends of the bill say the same thing; therefore those who are for it and against it are in favor of stopping the fraud which seems to be admitted. Now, I leave it to our opponents if the people who favor honest butter can not accomplish more and make a better law to stop this fraud than those who favor the sale of oleomargarine in the guise and color of butter.

I was interested in the speech of my friend from Illinois, yesterday, who said, "Oleomargarine is a good thing." He said, "It is healthful, nutritious, palatable;" and he is proud of its record. If he is proud of the record of oleomargarine, why can not it stand alone? Why can not it make its way into the market without masquerading in false colors? I was interested also in the fine speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and I notice he has now in his hand a stick of candy. Candy finds its way into the market without painting itself in the color of butter, and so do ice creams and ices. They are given beautiful tints, which make them attractive and make them sell. Why can not the distinguished gentlemen who believe in the manufacture of oleomargarine select some other attractive color instead of butter color, which was a distinctive color before they were born, and will continue to be?

You gentlemen who oppose this bill have all the colors of the rainbow to select from. You may take indigo, violet, green, or orange, or you may mix them up and blend them as you please, and select the most attractive tint, and we will give it to you as the trade-mark for oleomargarine. If you do not like that, you may take red, white, or blue, or red, white, and blue, and throw in a few stars if you please. I would rather you would desecrate the American flag than impose on the American cow. [Laughter.]

Suppose one of you gentlemen who oppose this measure should go down to the restaurant at noon and get a little lunch. You order bread and butter and get something that looks like butter——

Mr. WACHTER. I would ask the gentleman one more question right at this point.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Very well.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman seems to be very well posted on the difference between butter and oleomargarine. I would like to ask him a direct question: If oleomargarine was served on the table for butter, could the gentleman tell the difference?

Mr. DRISCOLL. No.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman does not seem to be up on the substance. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman has anticipated my idea.

Mr. WACHTER. Allow me just one more suggestion. Shakespeare says, "He that is robbed and does not know it is not robbed at all." In this case, when you eat oleomargarine and do not know it is oleomargarine you have not been fooled and you have not been imposed upon. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the gentleman will wait a moment. That is just what I object to. I object to paying for butter and being served with oleomargarine, or a substance that I do not know whether it is butter or not. I would not eat oleomargarine if I knew it. I order butter and something else is substituted, which is an imposition and a fraud upon me. I do not get the whole print, which has the mark "Oleomargarine" on it, which makes it possible for the proprietor to fool and deceive me.

Mr. WACHTER. If the gentleman can not tell the difference, what is the difference? [Laughter.] Does he want to see that print on every little piece that he places on his knife? If it tastes good, that is all you pay for. [Laughter.] If it is palatable, that is all you care for, and if it is not you are going to see the chef and see why he put bad butter on you. As long as you are satisfied you get the worth of your money.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am not satisfied. It is because your substitute makes it possible for the manufacturers and distributers of oleomargarine to impose on you and me by serving us an article which is not butter when we call for butter, that I oppose it. It is because it promotes and sanctions fraud and deceit that I oppose it. If this article is a good thing it ought to stand alone. If it is a bad thing and can not make its way into the markets of an intelligent and appreciative people it ought to die, and I am one of those who will vote for this bill without apologizing to my conscience. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I live in a State which last year produced 90,000,000 pounds of butter. That butter was worth nearly $20,000,000. Butter making is an important industry in that State. I have listened to this debate and to other debates when similar questions to the one now presented have been before the House, and I want to say that, in my judgment, the legislation that is sought by this bill is entirely within the precedents established by this House in 1885, when the present oleomargarine law was passed, and in 1897, when the filled-cheese bill was passed.

Every principle involved in this bill is found in each section of those other bills, varying only in degree. The principles underlying each are precisely the same. This House secured jurisdiction in each of those cases, as it does in this case, through the exercise of the taxing power. If there may be anything said justly in regard to usurpation or the improper use of a constitutional power in the bill under consideration, it may be said with equal truth with reference to each of the other bills to which I have adverted.

And I want to call the attention of my friend [Mr. GROSVENOR], who so interested the House by his admirable and eloquent speech in opposition to the present contemplated legislation, to the fact that he was a voter for the act of 1885 and that he was the progenitor of the bill of 1897. He reported it to this House; he reported, not a bill submitted—in fact, there were two submitted to his committee—but, dissatisfied with both of those, he produced a substitute, which he reported here, and I want to challenge him to find any principle in the bill we are now discussing that is not to be found in the bill which he reported and advocated.

I have read with a great deal of interest the report which the gentleman made upon that subject. It was interesting to me because of the entire divergence of view expressed in that solemn document, carefully prepared in the seclusion and quiet of his study, after conference with the sixteen other distinguished men who honor their positions as members of the Ways and Means Committee, from the hurried utterances in the heat of discussion as we have had them to-day. The gentleman says in this report:

> The market of the American dairyman for full cream cheese has been largely a European market, but since the introduction of filled cheese the market for the American manufacturer has fallen off very largely. The claim is made, and we sustain it, that it is a fraud upon the purchaser to sell him a manufactured article branded falsely or unbranded; and the principle upon which we have proceeded is to regulate the manufacture and sale by wholesale and retail and also for export of the commodity known as filled cheese, so as to prevent fraud, and to furnish complete protection to purchasers against the purchase of an inferior article sold to them by unscrupulous or ignorant dealers.

That was the opinion of the gentleman five years ago——

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is now.

Mr. HEPBURN. When discussing a bill that presented every feature of the one now under discussion; and I challenge any man to find in this bill that we are to-day discussing a single principle that is not to be found in the bill on which this was the gentleman's report. In that bill there was provided a tax of 1 cent a pound on a commodity that the gentleman in his report informs us was worth 4½ cents a pound—22 per cent put upon this article of legitimate commerce.

The gentleman nowhere claims in that report that this article was deleterious to health. On the contrary, he carefully avoided saying anything of that kind. He says it was stoutly contended on the one side that it was deleterious to health and it was as earnestly denied on the other side; and he is absolutely silent as to any opinion that he may have had himself from the mixed character of the evidence. But there is abundant proof that he was not after a deleterious compound.

> That for the purposes of this act the word "cheese" shall be understood to mean the food product known as cheese, and which is made from milk or cream and without the addition of butter, or any animal, vegetable, or other oils or fats, foreign to such milk or cream, with or without additional coloring.
> That for the purposes of this act certain substances and compounds shall be known and designated as "filled cheese," namely, all substances made of milk or skimmed milk with the admixture of butter, animal oils or fats, vegetable or any other oils or compounds foreign to such milk and made in imitation or semblance of cheese.

There is no word there of "unwholesome, deleterious, or dangerous to health." Every compound may be of the extreme of purity. Every compound may be a wholesome food, and yet the gentleman was the champion of that bill. Why? Because it interfered with our market abroad. That is the reason he assigned; because certain men sold it as cheese, certain men palmed this spurious, inferior, cheap article upon their customers as the better article.

Just what is proposed in this bill? It does not prohibit any man from making oleomargarine. There is no limitation placed upon the manufacture of it, and no man has a right to say that a less number of pounds will be made next year than were made last year, even if this bill passes. The gentleman and others have discussed this bill as though it was the purpose of it to drive a well-established industry out of the country. Not so. Every manufacturer of oleomargarine will be as free to make it after the passage of this act as he was before.

We do not propose to say that he shall not make it, that he shall not sell it, that he shall not build up a trade in it and for it. We simply say, "You shall not disguise it so as to perpetrate a fraud upon the people." That is the whole scope and purpose of the legislation. It is true we put a tax, possibly, of 10 cents on this, which is, perhaps, a little more than 100 per cent; but I find in this bill that the gentleman reported a provision whereby there is a duty upon filled cheese that is imported of 8 cents in addition to the tax; 9 cents of increase, our free-trade friends would say, to the consumer of an article that the report says is produced for 4½ cents a pound. Two hundred per cent! Eight cents of it duty and 1 cent of it internal revenue.

I am talking about this bill. The gentleman does not agree with me. All I ask is that the members of this House, if they have any doubt, will read it. I will stand by the verdict that they will render. I say that it provides for a revenue tax of 1 cent a pound and a duty in addition to that, if imported, of 8 cents a pound, or 200 per cent upon this article of diet for the poor. Sympathetic gentlemen, are they not? They have rung the changes on this article being an article of diet for the poor. They overlook, and none of them have mentioned the fact, that the bill that my friend voted for in 1895 put a tax of 2 cents a pound on all of the oleomargarine made in the United States, and it pays now 2 cents a pound.

The purpose of this bill is to diminish that to one-quarter of 1 cent. These friends of the poor were willing to put a tax of 2 cents a pound on an article of diet for him that cost 7 cents to produce it, and when you propose to cut it all off but a quarter of a cent they cavil and are troubled. The purpose of this legislation will be to cheapen oleomargarine in two ways: First, it takes a cent and three-quarters of tax off. Then it destroys its market as a competitor with butter, and cheapens it in that way. And yet, if it costs only 6 or 7 cents a pound to make it, it will leave an ample margin for the manufacturer and the retailer. The truth is, gentlemen, that a great deal of the opposition to this bill is fabricated. The premises upon which the opposition rests are fabricated premises. They have no place in truth.

I was somewhat amused yesterday to see an enthusiastic gentleman from Texas read the Democrats out of the party who would vote for this bill. By the way, gentlemen, have you not gone about far enough in reading men out of your party? [Laughter on the Republican side.] If you keep it up, there will be nobody left but the reader. [Laughter on the Republican side.] First, the gentleman from New York, a little while ago, read out of the party all the Bryanites. Then the gentleman from Texas, not to be outdone in generosity, read out of the party all the gold-standard fellows. Now this gentleman reads out of the party all who have a desire to vote for this bill, as some one a few days ago read out of the party all of those gentlemen who voted with us on the Philippine question or who voted for the urgent deficiency bill. Gentlemen, you had better quit it.

Let me remind you of some very respectable and eminent Democrats who voted for the present statute that puts 2 cents a pound on what these gentlemen say is an article of food for the poor. That violates the Constitution, in your language, in the use of the taxing power. They were very respectable men. I am not sure that I have the complete list. I have recognized twenty from the others, undoubtedly, in the list of yeas that were Democrats that I am not now able to identify as such.

But there were Mr. Ballentine, Mr. Barksdale, Mr. Bland of Missouri, Mr. Bynum, Governor Campbell, Mr. Dockery, Mr. Ermentrout, Mr. Hatch, Mr. Holman, Mr. King of Louisiana, Mr. Matson of Indiana, Mr. McCreary, who has just been elected to the Senate from Kentucky—and I am told that Kentucky is a Democratic State [laughter]—Mr. Morgan of Missouri, Governor O'Ferrall of Virginia, Mr. Outhwaite of Ohio, and Mr. Randall—Some of you gentlemen, perhaps, have heard of him as a Democrat—Mr. Springer of Illinois, Mr. Stone of Kentucky, Mr. Townshend of Illinois, and Mr. J. B. Weaver, then a Greenbacker, afterwards a Populist, and now the capsheaf in the Democratic stack out in our State. [Laughter.]

These were Democrats of approved character; leaders, all of them; eminent in your councils, and yet they did not hesitate to vote for the principles in this bill. Now, I am free to admit that I do not believe a great amount of revenue will be gathered into the Treasury under the operations of this bill. I think, perhaps, strictly speaking, it would be a misnomer to call it a revenue bill. And yet it is a necessity often resorted to, approved by the Supreme Court, engaged in by men most eminent in all of the parties that we have had in this country, to use the taxing power for purposes perhaps not strictly for revenue.

There are only two methods by which we can reach many of these things. One is through the interstate-commerce laws, and the other is through the taxing power. The limitations were placed in the Constitution years ago—more than a century ago—before it was possible to foresee the necessities that have arisen since, and that are upon us now; and so it has been a favorite way in the courts in all times, commencing with the old Virginia Marshall and running down through all the lines of eminent men, to seize upon certain portions of the Constitution, to which the term elastic has been given, and so understand them by interpretation as to meet the wants and necessities of the later day, not foreseen, not contemplated in the days of the framers of that instrument.

You all agree to its use in the power of construction when it serves your purposes, and you are always glad that it may be so. You all recognize the fact that the convictions of men with reference to constitutional provisions are not unchangeable. Fortunately for us, great men have always believed that the thing called "consistency" was a great bugaboo. And hence we have no criticism of harsh or harmful character when we find Thomas Jefferson at one time having one view and at another another view; when we see John C. Calhoun as the framer and advocate of a tariff law, and then devoting all of his life to answer the arguments that he made in 1816; when we find Daniel Webster opposing that bill, and afterwards becoming the champion of the strictest school of protection. So that it seems to me that we have a right to use this power in order to accomplish secondarily, or primarily if you choose, that which every man is well convinced in some way or other ought to be accomplished. We have adopted this method.

But it was a little amusing to see my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a little while ago expressing the fear and solicitude he had that some usurpative act would be indulged in by this House. I have here House bill 6565:

In the House of Representatives December 17, 1901, Mr. GROSVENOR introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Please observe the date, gentlemen—December 17. That was before the Christmas festivities began. This bill recites, "A bill to provide Federal inspection of mixed goods and the proper marking of the same." Now, I can conceive of but two ways in which our friend, a great constitutional lawyer, can satisfy himself that as a member of this House he would have jurisdiction of this subject. He might possibly through the taxing power. He might through the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations.

The bill provides:

That for the purposes of this act the words "pure wool" shall be understood to mean sheep's wool which has not been previously used in the manufacture of any other article, goods, or fabrics, and the words "woolen goods" to mean goods or fabrics composed wholly of such wool.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes of this act all manufactures made in imitation of woolen goods which are not composed wholly of pure wool shall be known as "mixed goods."

SEC. 3. That all manufacturers of mixed goods shall mark, label, or tag such goods in plain printed letters and figures which can not be detached except by design, and the mark, label, or tag shall state accurately the constituent fibers or other materials or substances of which such goods are composed, and the relative portion or per cent of each.

SEC. 4. That all clothiers, tailors, or other persons who shall make any mixed goods into clothing, garments, or any article whatsoever to be sold as such, shall also place thereon and firmly attach to each and every garment and article so made a label, tag, or tab similar to that required of the manufacturer of the goods or fabrics of which it is made, and showing the same facts.

SEC. 5. That all mixed goods of every kind and description whatsoever, including cloths, clothing, and every article manufactured or in any of the processes or stages of manufacture imported from foreign countries, shall be marked, labeled, or tagged as provided for in case of manufactures of the same in the United States.

Now, here is jurisdiction beyond question:

The labels, tags, or tabs required by this act shall be affixed by the owners or importers while it is in the custody of the custom-house officers, and it shall be the duty of such officers to inspect all such goods, fabrics, or other articles, and see that they are properly labeled; and such goods shall not pass out of the custody of such officers until such labels or tags have been so affixed; and every officer of customs who permits any mixed goods as defined in this act to pass out of his custody or control without compliance by the owner or importer thereof with the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than one year.

SEC. 6. That any manufacturer or importer of mixed goods as defined in this act who shall sell, offer to sell, or permit to be sold or removed from the place of manufacture or the custody of the custom-house officers, any goods, fabrics, or articles of any kind whatsoever manufactured, or in the process of manufacture, without being properly marked or labeled as required by this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 and not more than $500 for each such offense.

SEC. 7. That any clothier, tailor, merchant, or other person who knowingly purchases from the manufacturer, importer, or other person, any mixed goods as defined in this act, which is not labeled or marked according to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 and not more than $1,000 for each such offense; and if such clothier, tailor, merchant, or other person so purchasing such goods as aforesaid shall manufacture into clothing and sell or offer to sell the same, or any such person who shall sell or offer to sell, or expose for sale, any such goods or fabrics without being properly labeled, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $100 and not more than $1,000 for each such offense.

SEC. 8. That any manufacturer, merchant, dealer, agent, employee, or other person, who shall knowingly sell, trade, or exchange, or offer to sell, trade, or exchange, or expose in his place of business for the purpose of trade, sale, or exchange, any clothing, goods, fabrics, or other articles known as mixed goods, as defined in this act, which are not labeled, marked, or tabbed according to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $100 and not more than $1,000.

Here is a great oversight in this bill. I commend the thought to my friend—when is that tag to be taken off? [Laughter.] It is a most important matter, gentlemen, and I can conceive of a score of reasons why that tag should be kept there. You may want it for evidence or something of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentlemen if there is any provision in the bill he has read applying the Federal power of taxation to these mixed goods?

Mr. HEPBURN. None in the world. That is why I wondered how my friend got jurisdiction over the subject. I can see how he might over the importation, but how did he get it over those manufactured here?

SEC. 9. That any manufacturer, importer, merchant, or other person who shall willfully, recklessly, or carelessly mark incorrectly any cloth, goods, fabrics, or any article manufactured, or in the process of manufacture therefrom, required by this act to be labeled or marked, so as to show a larger per cent of wool, or a smaller per cent of shoddy or other cheaper fiber or material, or in any manner that will, or is calculated to, deceive and mislead the purchaser thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $50 and not more than $5,000 for each such offense.

If he does that carelessly, that results in deceit and imposing in some way upon the innocent purchaser, he is to be fined $5,000, perhaps, for that careless act. Why? Oh, not to protect sheep, surely not. [Laughter.] The man that would suspect that for a moment would be unworthy of a seat in this House. [Laughter.]

Now, I have read that bill for the purpose of showing that, in the language of Widow Bedott, "We are all poor critturs" [laughter]; and that when the question of interest comes home to us, it does take hold of us with more or less force. And I have taken the liberty to think, recognizing this universal weakness of us all, that perhaps some of our friends on the other side who have been so vehement in denouncing this legislation would not have done it if a Yankee had not taught them some years ago how to add 30 per cent to their cotton crop by expressing the oil from that which theretofore they threw to one side. Oil is a factor in the manufacture of the butter that we are complaining of—the oleomargarine that we want to compel to sail under its own color.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass. I believe it is a good and wise measure; that we are only exercising the power that we have abundant right to exercise in this way, and that a good result will come from it. It will aid in putting out of the market an article that, as it is now colored and now used and put up in its present condition, perpetrates a fraud constantly, every day; It will then be known by its own proper name, I hope not to its harm in the long run, and to the benefit of many who are now imposed upon by it. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2123. An act for the relief of the heirs at law of M. A. Phelps and the heirs at law of John W. Renner;

S. 1037. An act granting a pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry;

S. R. 49. Joint resolution increasing the membership of the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library; and Senate concurrent resolution No. 17.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. 84, being a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the forests, rivers, and mountains of the Southern Appalachian region, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I shall not impugn the motives of any member of this House. I claim for myself the same privilege which I accord to every other member, to advocate and to vote for a measure according to the dictates of duty and conscience. Furthermore, I do not think that invective can add to the information of members of this House. What is wanted upon a subject of this kind, in a running debate such as we have here, is light and not so much heat. I believe that the Representatives in the American Congress are just as honest as the great constituencies which they represent, and I believe that on God's green earth there is not a more honest people than the American people.

But sometimes legislators, like doctors, disagree. I think if this question were fully understood by the Representatives who are to vote upon it, that, nothwithstanding there may now be within their minds an intention to support the measure, they would not do so. I take it that this debate is for the purpose of gaining information and that it is not entirely for home consumption. Of course, it goes without saying that every Representative ought to be true to his constituency, but in the meantime every Representative wants to be certain that he is right on a great question of this kind.

Now, the men on this side and on the other side of the House who oppose this measure do not, in the first place, concede its constitutionality. It is not entirely free of that doubt; there are indeed grave doubts as to the constitutionality of this measure. I do not want to dwell upon this point to any great extent; I simply want to call the attention of members to the fact that in this bill is involved an entirely new principle that has not yet been passed upon by the Supreme Court.

One question presented is whether one industry can be taxed out of existence by the exercise of the taxing power for the benefit of another. There is also involved the principle embodied in the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and that is whether Congress can delegate to a State one of its powers and thereby totally prevent a manufactured article of one State from going as an article of commerce into another State.

The question is not what construction gentlemen may place upon this bill from their standpoint, but the question is what construction the court of last resort will place upon it. Under a well-defined principle of construction the courts must first be guided by the language of the bill.

I say that under the first section of this bill the legislatures of the different States have conferred upon them (whether it be constitutional or not) the power to absolutely forbid oleomargarine which may be manufactured in one State (for instance, the State of Illinois) going into another State (for instance, the State of Texas) and there sold. Now, this is a broad assertion, and I expect to call gentlemen's attention to the language and ask them to say whether the construction for which I contend is not a right one. I read the language of the bill:

That all articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon the arrival within the limits of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory or the District of Columbia, etc.

Now, this is the very language of the Wilson Act, which now governs the legislature of Iowa. That legislature has not gone to the extent of absolutely excluding liquor from the confines of the State. As I understand, liquor is sold there in original packages, and then the law of the State controls the sale. But does any gentleman on this floor contend that under the Wilson Act the legislature of Iowa can not pass a law (and that is exactly the language of this bill) to immediately seize every particle of liquor imported into the State the minute it lands upon the platform of a railroad or the wharf of a port? It can seize it and condemn it, no matter though it were sent to a purchaser there who wanted to use it (in the language of this bill and in the language of the Iowa statute) for his own consumption.

It is true—and I do not want to mislead anyone on this floor—it is true that the Supreme Court has not passed upon that paramount issue. It has not yet decided that a legislature can absolutely prevent the importation of an article of commerce from one State into another by seizing such article and destroying it. But it is claimed by the advocates of this bill that the legislatures have the power absolutely to control, to the exclusion of Congress, oleomargarine imported from one State into another. Then what is to prevent such a legislature from passing a law that immediately upon the arrival of a pound of oleomargarine, red or white, colored or uncolored, shipped from one State into another, it shall be seized and destroyed? I say candidly that the Supreme Court of the United States has never gone to that extent.

Whether it will do so, whether it can do so under the interstate-commerce laws of the Constitution of the United States, is a doubtful question; but evidently it is the intent of this bill. It can be the only reasonable construction of it, that the legislature of every State may not only say that oleomargarine shall not be sold or manufactured colored, but even that it shall not be manufactured at all. Let us consider this phase of the bill.

Under this bill I want to call your attention again to the language of it. I say any State legislature, if it sees fit, can absolutely prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine as it is now understood in the trade and defined in the act of 1886. Let us see whether I am right about that. I direct your attention to the proviso of the first section of this bill:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to permit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from coloration or ingredients that cause it to look like butter.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what does that mean? Not only free from coloration, but free from the ingredients of butter. Now, everyone who has given this mattter any consideration whatever understands that either butter or milk and cream enter into the composition of oleomargarine as legitimate and necessary ingredients of it. Oleomargarine as now manufactured and sold is made partly of butter or milk and cream of the best quality. Without these ingredients it is not complete, it is not oleomargarine.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Will my friend allow me to have something read from the desk? May I interrupt him for that long?

Mr. KLEBERG. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the tax on oleomargarine, like the tax on imports, is a local issue.

Mr. KLEBERG. Now, if that is any gratification to my friend he is welcome to it.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. No; I wanted to emphasize the situation.

Mr. KLEBERG. No, that is not the situation. I place this question above local issues. The question here is whether one industry shall be destroyed for the benefit of another. The question is whether a false principle shall be recognized now by this Congress that the powerful may tyrannize over and oppress the weak; whether a monopoly legalized by Congress shall rule the people. That is the question.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Permit me to say that I agree with the gentleman in the position that he has taken on this bill.

Mr. KLEBERG. I want to make this argument on the legal question involved in this bill, because I do not think any gentleman has touched upon it, except the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when he cited section 3 of the bill. But I want to emphasize it, I want to call it specifically and clearly, if I can, to the minds of Representatives. The fact is that no oleomargarine as now constituted, as now known in the markets, can be manufactured if this bill passes. Oleomargarine as now understood and defined by law has in it an ingredient either of butter, milk, or cream. It is that which gives it, according to the opponents of oleomargarine, its color, or at least a part of the color, however slight.

You will observe that in this first section the original draftsman of this bill had the word "yellow," which was stricken out by the committee. Why? So that if any milk or cream or butter was used in the manufacture of oleomargarine and it had the semblance or looked like butter, however light the color may be, then it came under the ban of this law. Ah, gentlemen say they are not trying to injure or to destroy the oleomargarine industry.

I say, if this bill passes, not speaking now of the third section to which the attention of the House has been called by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], if this first section passes, then such an article as oleomargarine as now commonly understood, and as understood in legal parlance, can not be manufactured, and you will have nothing but the raw fat, nothing but lard, nothing but cotton-seed oil and the other constituents conglomerated, but you have not that part of milk and cream which gives it the flavor and puts it in demand for consumers and upon the market, and you have something else. You may have some kind of a fat substance, but you have not got oleomargarine. You have destroyed, you have wiped out the very definition of the word from the statute books. Especially is this so when we take into consideration the clause which taxes colored oleomargarine 10 cents a pound in this connection. If the legislature of a State fails to legislate oleomargarine out of existence, then Congress has provided the 10-cent tax to prohibit its manufacture and sale.

Yet, gentlemen come here and claim that they can make it cheaper, and may have the same kind of butterine or the same kind of oleomargarine that is now consumed by some people. But you can not, because oleomargarine is now defined by law, and it is recognized as an article of commerce in the market, and contains a certain per cent of butter, or milk and cream.

I do not charge that those who advocate this bill have a sinister purpose in advocating it for this purpose. We must take their declaration that they have no intention to destroy oleomargarine as an industry as an honest declaration; but when we have the courts of last resort come to a construction of this language, we will see that when the so-called oleomargarine is seized under State law and it contains one of the ingredients which is embraced in butter, in other words, that it contains the ingredients of milk or cream, or butter, that then it comes under the ban of the law, whether it is slightly red, yellow, or any other color which butter sometimes has.

Now, that is the real question. It is to that point that I principally wanted to call the attention of Democrats as well as Republicans. There can not be any other reasonable construction given to this language. So that the industry of the manufacture of oleomargarine would be totally destroyed. It is not a question of crippling, it is not a question of mere injury or partial destruction, but a question of wiping it out altogether, root and branch; and I believe it is the purpose of those who are standing outside of the halls of Congress, when they ask this class legislation, that it is to do away completely with the competition, and a legitimate competition, in a legitimate article of trade.

It is to destroy it, and it is for the purpose of putting out of use that article that is not only as healthful and as pure but is better than that article known as renovated process butter, to wit, the deeply colored butter manufactured over from old rancid butter; and gentlemen may dilate and expatiate on the question of color as much as they please, it remains a species of fraud when used in this renovated butter, for it is a fraud on the consumer of butter. I do not say that coloring is necessarily a fraud; but, gentlemen, I say that the supporters of this bill, the advocates of this bill, say that the color mainly is evidence of the fraud when used in coloring oleomargarine. If it is, then the coloring of butter is also a fraud.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. KLEBERG. For a question.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Is not the real reason why the members from Texas are opposed to this bill because they think that Texas oil can be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine? [Laughter.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Well, if the gentleman has no higher standard of taste than to suppose that this prompts us, then I suppose he is one of the few who will relish it.

I wish to call attention to another point. I do not want to go further upon the question of color. I want to call your attention to the fraud that our friends talk about. I say that a great deal of that cry of fraud is exaggerated. Gentlemen seem to presume that every consumer of oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, is a child who needs a guardian, and as the gentleman from Ohio well said, this clamor does not come from the consumer; it is simply one of those lame excuses that our friends bring here that the consumer is objecting to it.

Now, will anyone take the position that the consumer does not know every time, or at least in most instances, that it was oleomargarine? Why, the very fact which is cited here by the gentleman from Wisconsin that these dealers in the State—I believe, of Illinois—are offering an article there so cheap that it can not be anything but oleomargarine, the very fact that it is marked oleomargarine, comes that way from the factory, can not deceive any one.

I say this hue and cry that has been gotten up about this question was done by sending broadcast over the country printed postal cards and circulars, to make the honest dairymen and consumers believe there was great fraud; and possibly, in one or two cases out of the hundreds, people think that they will be greatly benefited by this bill, and that they are going to be greatly injured by the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

It is a manufactured sentiment, and I am satisfied that the great mass of the people who are represented by gentlemen who will support this bill, when they fully understand the scope of it, that it is to destroy a cheaper legitimate article of food, that it would not in any way protect the public so far as fraud is concerned; in other words, that if they fully understood the measure that is foisted upon this House by the people who sell and manufacture and color renovated butter, they would instruct their representatives to vote against it.

I think the time will come when this measure is fully understood. If it should pass, it will come quickly when the people fully understand that it aims at the destruction of a legitimate enterprise and industry and that it raises the price of the so-called dairy butter; that it is the entering wedge for other classes and monopolies to come before Congress and ask for this kind of legislation. They will instruct the Representatives whom they send here to repeal the measure which they now seek to pass and which probably they will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9206 and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 49 and consider it at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 49, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library, authorized by section 82 of the Revised Statutes, shall hereafter consist of five members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE RESOLUTION AND BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title and the following resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 17:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. 84, being a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the forests, rivers, and mountains of the Southern Appalachian region, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture—to the Committee on Printing.

S. 2123. An act for the relief of the heirs at law of M. A. Phelps and the heirs at law of John W. Renner—to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks leave to extend his remarks on the oleomargarine bill in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that every gentleman who has spoken or may speak in the debate on the oleomargarine bill may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all members who have spoken or may speak on the oleomargarine bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Ordered, That 500 extra copies of the bill (S. 3521) to enlarge the jurisdiction and powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission be printed for the use of the Senate.

EXECUTION OF LEGAL INSTRUMENTS IN THE PHILIPPINES, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for land situate in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
JAMES McMILLAN,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. JENKINS,
SPENCER BLACKBURN,
W. S. COWHERD.
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOAR. There was a bill on this subject which passed the Senate the other day enlarging the scope of the measure originally proposed. Is that included in the report?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this is the bill he alludes to. The House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate, but the House conferees receded from the agreement and agreed to the amendments.

Mr. HOAR. It is all right, then. I did not know but that it was some independent measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the same bill.

The report was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the committee to strike out on page 44 lines 11 to 16, inclusive.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. What does the Senator from Maine desire?

Mr. HALE. I wish to make a statement about the business of the Senate as presented by the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; I give way, sir.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am very desirous of finishing the consideration of this bill as early as possible, and practically the bill, so far as its provisions go, has already been passed by the Senate. There are only one or two matters, which will not take time, that have been reserved.

The consideration of the bill is complicated by a discussion of the scandal, or alleged scandal, in Alaska. The subject-matter is not in the bill. The Noyes episode is not here. While I am powerless entirely and am at the mercy of Senators, I venture to appeal to them to let me go on with the consideration of the provisions which are in the bill and get it passed, so that it may go over to the House.

Of course I understand that some Senators may feel that, after what was said yesterday afternoon, there should be the opportunity of reply. I see the force of that. As I said, I am powerless; I can do nothing; but I appeal to Senators generally, after proper reply has been made, not to prolong the discussion of that subject on the bill, because the Senate is clearly divided upon it. There are friends of the judge here, who will stand by him, and there are many Senators who believe that there is a bad condition up there. That debate may run on indefinitely. I shall sit down now, simply with this general appeal to Senators, that after proper reply has been made, if Senators desire to reply, we do not prolong the discussion further on this matter, but let the Senate go on and complete the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. The Senator from South Carolina yielded to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina was recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will give way to the Senator from North Dakota, if he desires the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe, Mr. President, that I had the floor when we adjourned last evening, and I was about to speak to the subject that was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there are proper times for considering subjects that ought to be brought before the Senate. There are proper times for bringing a subject before the Senate. I do not know of anything that can possibly be said to be more inopportune than the dragging in of this Noyes difficulty and this Nome matter on every conceivable opportunity during the last twelve or fifteen months.

It has been brought in and the most villainous charges have been made, charges which I knew then and know now to be entirely unfounded, charges which I know to be absolutely false. I have had to restrain myself for months when listening to these false accusations, with the hope that the parties who seemed to be so instrumental in carrying out the designs of certain persons who desire to control the entire Nome country would cease at some time, and feel themselves that a matter which was being duly considered by the courts ought to be left in the hands of the courts until they had disposed of it, and that it would be premature for the Senate to express an opinion, much less to render a verdict, upon matters then before the Supreme Court of the United States or the court of appeals before the judges themselves had seen fit to put upon the record their own convictions and their own decisions in the matter.

One man has been assailed particularly. I know the Senator from South Carolina; I know that he belongs to that class of men who have been known for their chivalrous conduct at all times; I know, further, that if he was well acquainted with Alexander McKenzie, the man whom he stabs here in the back and in the darkness and under conditions in which he can not defend himself, his own sense of manhood, his own sense of fair play, would require him to desist a while at least from an attack of that kind.

I have known this man, Mr. President, for twenty years, ever since I have been in business for myself. I know him to be a noble-hearted, generous, impulsive, sympathetic individual, one whom the Senator from South Carolina would love as a brother if he knew him. He is a man who is so true to his own principles of manhood that he would give his very life's blood for any friend and ask for no remuneration on earth except the fidelity of a friend to a friend.

Now, Mr. President, this man has been assaulted. He has been declared to be a thief, a man who has entered into a conspiracy, and he has been condemned by the circuit court of California of the ninth district as being, in connection with Judge Noyes, in a conspiracy to rob people of their rights.

No person on earth has ever placed his finger upon a single line or letter or any word to show that Alexander McKenzie or Judge Noyes has ever wronged a man out of one single dollar, and I defy anybody to obtain anything from these records to show that either of these men, so charged by this court and so convicted, has ever in reality injured another individual.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I simply want to ask a question. I simply want to know the facts.

I read the opinion of the court last night. It is stated in that opinion that it was proven that Mr. McKenzie had gone to a firm of lawyers who represented one of the claimants to these mines and had stated to them that it was best that they should transfer to him a certain interest in that mine, and they did so transfer it—I think a fourth interest—and that after the transfer was made to him Judge Noyes appointed him receiver to take charge of the mine in the litigation then pending. Is that a fact or has the court misstated the fact?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator. The man who makes that statement or attempts to make that statement is proven in the very record from which that statement is obtained to be a falsifier. That man himself made an affidavit absolutely to the contrary before the influence of this syndicate was so strong as to bring him over and hire him to make those false statements.

The other two members of the same firm with whom he claims to have been a partner, and who know as much about everything as he does and who were his partners, denounce it as an absolute falsehood. He himself has denounced it before in his own evidence.

I stated in the few remarks I made yesterday that this conviction or this judgment has segregated certain portions of evidence taken from over 3,000 pages of irrelevant testimony, testimony that was merely hearsay, and twice removed in many instances; and even then it had to segregate the parts and put them together without giving either the public, who are interested in this matter, or the Senate the evidence from which the court drew their conclusions.

Mr. BERRY rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to say to the Senator that I will reach all of these points in time if he will give me but an opportunity.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit one other question, I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. McCUMBER. Gladly. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. BERRY. It is also stated by the court that after this mining proposition was returned to the parties from whom it was taken by Judge Noyes's order, Mr. McKenzie, in making his report, reported that he had received from working the mines $35,000, and that his expenses had been much more than that amount. The court thereupon states that upon investigation it was found that he had received $100,000 from working the claim and that his expenses had been only $35,000. Is that also a false statement by the court, or is it true?

Mr. McCUMBER. The statement is incorrect, as shown from all of the evidence which I have read—not in the 3,000 pages, but from evidence bearing upon that, with which I am pretty well acquainted.

Now, I purpose to go through with this matter. Who is this man Hume who gives the testimony referred to? What is his standing in Alaska? What is he known as being there? Go into the country and find yourself the standing of that man, and it would condemn him without anything else.

But even he does not attempt to convict Judge Noyes, except as he testifies that somebody else said to him that somebody else was interested. He did not have the talk with McKenzie, nor does he claim that, as I understand; but he talked with somebody else who said that McKenzie had that interest, and that McKenzie could control that court and would control the judge.

Now, I have known Alexander McKenzie. I have known him all these years. A more quiet, unassuming individual I never met, and I know enough about the man to know that even if there was anything of that character in his mind he would have kept it to himself. I know him to be a man of sufficient intelligence to do that. I know his position there. When any man accuses him of entering into a conspiracy so fishy as that which has been indicated in that decision, I simply stand between him and any such false accusation.

I will go over this matter and explain it not only to the Senator but to the Senate, so that Senators may understand some of the particulars in this case and can draw a correct conclusion and see whether or not all of the judgments that have been entered are just and fair, or whether they are the result of a prejudice or a passion created by this syndicate that seeks to control all of that country by a persistent purchase of the press and publishing day after day falsehoods and false accusations.

Mr. President, I say that this has been uttered so often here that forbearance has ceased to be a virtue upon my part. Without attacking any judge, because I will admit that they are all honorable men, I shall at the same time show what has been done, according to the record, in the McKenzie case, and you can draw your conclusion from what is the possibility of what may have been accomplished in the other case.

These are honorable men, as was stated by the Senator from California, and I want to tell him that as to Alexander McKenzie, Dudley Dubose, Mr. Frost, Mr. Wood, each and every one of them is shown to be as honorable a man as the Senator or any other person. So it is a question of one party of honorable men convicting another honorable man and sentencing him without any evidence whatever, scarcely, or with barely enough to sustain themselves upon the record.

They may be honorable men. I am not attacking them. I consider, however, that their judgments have been warped; and when you tell me that a black mark is white simply because a white man made it I will still criticise it as being a black mark, and it is not going to change the color.

What these judges have done the record shows. The evidence on which they have acted is a clear, concise statement. Here is the record in the McKenzie case. At the last end of it you will find the conclusion of the court, and I want to tell every Senator here that there is not one scintilla of evidence in that entire record which will support the conclusion of the court of a conspiracy on the part of Alexander McKenzie.

Let me see what the facts show in this case. It is stated that Mr. McKenzie and Judge Noyes went to Seattle and from Seattle to Nome on the same boat, and from the fact that they were seen upon the same boat the court concludes that there must have been a conspiracy.

How did they happen to go on the same boat? The judge went there intending to take a boat later. He had engaged his passage upon a boat which was to leave at a later period. Finding that there was a boat going in a day or two, the same one on which McKenzie went to Nome, he went, with his secretary, on board that boat.

Now, when he got to Nome I want to explain the conditions he found at that place. You will remember that there had been no judge in the country for about a year. Judge Johnson, who is now attorney for this Lane syndicate, had come off the bench just at the time when they were about trying some important cases, and he afterwards acts as the attorney for this same syndicate.

Then they had no judge there for about a year. The syndicate did not need a judge there. They had enough men in their employ, enough under their control, so that they could get along very well without a court, for sometimes a court becomes an inconvenient thing.

He found another condition there. There were somewhere about 100 cases, as I am informed, that were all ready and the papers all drawn the moment the court should arrive in Alaska; and the moment that he did arrive Judge Noyes was importuned and motions were made before him for the purpose of securing receivers and granting injunctions.

What should he have done under the conditions as they existed? Here were hundreds of men out of employment. It is said there were about 1,000 men of disreputable character there, many of whom had come out of penitentiaries. There was a lawless element there; they were craving for work; there was nothing to do. One of the parties representing the Lane syndicate desired that the judge simply grant injunctions, if he did anything; but if he granted injunctions against the working of those mines, then there would have been a thousand or more men who would be lying idle.

It is claimed here that he simply appointed Mr, McKenzie receiver in all of these cases so that he might take the mines for the benefit of himself and the judge. Let us see what the facts are. The were but 15 cases—I believe that is the limit of the number of cases—in which a receiver was appointed, as I am informed, about that number. There were something over a hundred applications and many were refused. In many cases receivers were discharged and nothing further done with reference to the claims.

So it is that this great claim that McKenzie went there and was appointed receiver over half of the Nome country falls when one understands the real facts in the case as to the appointment of receivers. Alexander McKenzie was appointed receiver in some four or five of these cases; other persons were appointed receivers in other cases. You could not get a receiver on every corner of the street there; everybody could not justify in a sum of $35,000 to $100,000, and it was impossible for Judge Noyes, in his short acquaintance there, to pick up a man who had been there for any number of years, knowing him to be a straight and competent man.

Now, they say that no notice was given; that the moment he landed he appointed these receivers. That is true, Mr. President; but they do not tell all of it. He appointed receivers then and there because the claims involved were placer mining claims, and within the ten days' notice of hearing great damage could have been done. He appointed a receiver and said: "You can now make a motion to discharge the receiver;" and such motions were made, and the court refused to discharge the receiver and McKenzie went into possession.

I want to state to the Senate what was done by Alexander McKenzie, this man who is charged with being a thief; this man who is charged with stealing so much property; this man who is charged with having entered into a conspiracy to rob that whole country. Not one dollar, not one cent, of all the gold that was taken out of that Nome country by him was unaccounted for. Not only this, but it is shown that in mining these claims before that time the expense of securing the gold was about 50 per cent—from 40 to 50 per cent—of its output.

This man who is said to have robbed these individuals reduced it down to between 16 and 18 per cent. The judge made an order that every person interested in the clean up of the gold should be present, and they were present, and their seal and concurrence was impressed upon every ounce of gold that was taken from the mines.

After he had been working the mines a little while and they saw that they were yielding well under the good management of Alexander McKenzie, then those who represented the opposite side came to the court and said "the bonds of McKenzie are not high enough." "Very well," said the court, "we will protect you in this way." So the court made an order that every dollar's worth of the gold that was taken from those mines should be taken to certain vaults; and that order declared that the gold should there "remain until the further order of the court herein."

When that gold was placed in the vaults it was out of the control of Alexander McKenzie, except in so far as he could take it out upon the order of the court, and he could only take it out from time to time as the court ordered portions of it to be taken out and used in the payment of the men who were working under him.

This was the condition, Mr. President, when an application was made for an appeal. Judge Noyes looked over the Alaskan code at that time, and I want to tell you what he found on the question of whether an appeal would lie from an interlocutory order. Chapter 51, part 4, of Carter's Annotated Alaska Codes, section 507, page 252, reads as follows:

> An appeal may be taken to the circuit court of appeals from any interlocutory order granting or dissolving an injunction, refusing to grant or dissolve an injunction made or rendered in any cause pending before the district court within sixty days after the entry of such interlocutory order. The proceedings in other respects in the district court in the cause of which such interlocutory order was made shall not be stayed during the pendency of such appeal unless otherwise ordered by the district court.

We well know that there is no appeal from interlocutory orders, unless allowed by express statute. This express statute allows an appeal from an order dissolving or granting an injunction, and there stops. Those attorneys who represented the opposite side from those requesting the appointment of receivers claimed that this in effect was an order of injunction, because it enjoined the other claimants from proceeding to work the mines, and they made their application and they argued the case before Judge Noyes upon that point.

Judge Noyes rightly held that every appointment of a receiver over the claim of any individual necessarily enjoined the other person from working the same property; and he held that it was not an injunctional order, but an interlocutory order appointing a receiver only.

Mr. President, there was another law passed about the same time—in fact, upon the same day—granting an appeal from an interlocutory order appointing a receiver. It was one amending the law pertaining to the right and authority of the court of appeals of the ninth circuit. A copy of this law, however, was not in Alaska, or, at least, it was not known by any of the attorneys at that particular time.

So it was held that it was not appealable, and Judge Noyes refused to allow an appeal to be taken. Then the parties went to the ninth circuit, and there made application to that circuit court for an order allowing an appeal. At that time they had before them this law, which was passed, I think, on June 7, 1900, on the same day as the other law, which carried into effect the Alaskan code.

Mr. President, here was the first order that was brought to Mr. McKenzie's notice. It was a writ of supersedeas issued by the circuit court of the ninth circuit. First, was the order which directed and ordered the issuance of a writ of supersedeas. This order was filed in the lower court—that is, in the court at Nome.

This order simply directed that a writ of supersedeas issue out of the court and that writ simply commanded all persons to desist from further action in the matter. It did not require them to turn over any of the property; it did not decide the case before it ever got to the court of appeals; but simply directed them to desist from any further action.

An order was drafted by the attorneys representing in that case Mr. Chipps and others, which it seems was afterwards affirmed by the ninth circuit court of appeals, which writ went entirely outside of the order. It not only contained what this order contained, but it went further, and directed the defendant, Alexander McKenzie, to turn over all of the property received by him under and by virtue of such orders appointing him receiver.

Mr. President, when these writs were brought to the notice of Mr. McKenzie, this question arose: What should be done with the gold? Was it the intention of the circuit court of appeals that he should turn the gold dust over without ever having paid the men who took it out of the ground? Was it the intention that he should turn over all of this property before there had been a hearing, or was it simply the intention to stay proceedings in the matter?

All of the attorneys interested went before Judge Noyes and had a fair and open hearing upon this proposition. McKenzie said, "I am not an attorney; I am simply a layman. I will submit this matter to my attorney, and if my attorney tells me to turn over that property, then I will turn it over; I will act according to his advice." He gave the writ to his attorney, Hon. T. J. Geary, who, after looking it over, advised him about as follows: "There is no question now under the writ but that you should turn over the property itself. As to whether you shall turn over the gold taken from this property, I desire to consider it further."

McKenzie reported upon that and asked for further time. This writ was served about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and by 6 o'clock in the afternoon he expected to get a reply from his attorney. His attorney, after examining the law, after looking at the writ, after going into the case as much as possible, advised Mr. KcKenzie in writing that the writ was void, first, because no appeal would lie from an interlocutory order appointing a receiver, and, second, because the order directing the issuance of the writ of supersedeas never directed that it should contain a statement that the property and gold dust itself should be turned over, and thereupon the entire case determined by the writ allowing the appeal, and not waiting until the case should arrive at the court to be determined by the court itself.

What would any honest man have done under the conditions? What condition was he in? I want to call your attention, Mr. President, to some of the statements that were made at the time of the hearing in the case of Alexander McKenzie, when he was brought before the court for contempt; and I especially call attention to the attorneys who were prosecuting Alexander McKenzie.

When they had completed the testimony before the referee or commissioner appointed by the circuit court of appeals, they then went before the court itself, and the attorneys who had prosecuted this case from beginning to end made this statement to the court. After reciting the same facts which I have recited, they said:

> This is a statement of the facts, with this addition, that the receiver, McKenzie, seems to have been between two fires. He was being threatened by the plaintiffs and their attorneys that if he did not comply with the writ he would be subjected to contempt of the order of Judge Noyes—

It will be remembered that this was the order in which Judge Noyes directed that that gold should not be taken from the vaults except upon his order, and if McKenzie obeyed that order he could not turn over one ounce of that gold without being subject to an action for contempt before Judge Noyes. The attorneys further say:

and he was being threatened by the attorneys for the defendants that if he did not comply with the order of the writ of supersedeas that he would be in contempt of this court.

This statement we make in order that we may fully lay the matter before the court, desiring to take the advice of the court upon the proposition, but not wishing to have the court believe that we are in any manner attempting to use a quasi-criminal process of the court in furtherance of our prosecution of a civil remedy, or to force a settlement of it; and as we have stated, we would like either to dismiss the case, should the court be of the opinion that we may, or to submit it upon the testimony herein given in the proceedings above mentioned.

This paper was signed by J. C. Campbell and W. H. Metson, and is dated January 31, 1901. It was placed in the record as showing the desire of the persons who were prosecuting in two of these cases, that Mr. McKenzie should be released, and admitting before the court that he was placed in a position in which he ought not to be convicted of any offense whatever.

Mr. President, when this matter got up to the court in San Francisco, they found another section of our laws, which it seems had not been published, or had not been in Alaska, at least, at the time, a law in which an appeal might lie from an interlocutory order appointing a receiver. This was the act of June 6, 1900, amending section 7 of the court of appeals act, which was approved, and reads as follows:

That where upon a hearing in equity in a district court or in a circuit court, or by a judge therof in vacation, an injunction shall be granted or continued or receiver appointed by an interlocutory order or decree, in a cause in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing such injunction or appointing such receiver to the circuit court of appeals.

There was a serious question whether the district court referred to there did not mean a constitutional district court and not a legislative court. It had been decided again and again, and under similar statutes, that "district court" referred simply to a constitutional court.

The Supreme Court held that this section, considered in pari materia with the other section of the Alaska code, gave the circuit court of appeals jurisdiction, and, considering that they had jurisdiction of the case, then the United States Supreme Court would not go into the question whether or not, upon a writ of habeas corpus, the evidence was sufficient, or any proper evidence had been adduced, to justify the conviction of Mr. McKenzie. That was the way the case went out of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have stated, and I reiterate, that I read very carefully at the time the entire record in the McKenzie case. I also read the decision of the court as written by Judge Ross in the same case, and in that decision he gives four-fifths of the whole time and space to the consideration of what he claims to be an attempted conspiracy on the part of Judge Noyes and Alexander McKenzie. The word "conspiracy," or any fact or circumstance relating to conspiracy, is not to be found in that entire record. Where did he get it? I found out afterwards where he got portions of it. The greater portion seemed to be from publications in the San Francisco newspapers. They were not a part of the record.

When this was done and disposed of, the next step that was taken was to secure the pardon of Alexander McKenzie. All these matters were laid before the Attorney-General, and he gave them careful consideration. In his opinion, upon the record, the circuit court of appeals should not have done certainly anything more than to have given a mild rebuke for the offense which was committed—namely, obeying the order and direction of his attorney but for two hours or more, and then disobeying possibly the order of the circuit court of appeals, because I want to tell you, Mr. President, that within three hours after these writs were served the bank in which these vaults were was in possession of an armed force, and neither Mr. McKenzie nor anyone else could have carried into effect that order, and even if he had he would take the chance of being brought up before Judge Noyes for contempt of court in disobeying his orders. He acted under the advice of his attorney.

What did he suffer for that? I want the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who I know is a man of sympathy, and naturally kind and gentle, for a moment to consider what under those circumstances would have been a just and proper punishment for the simple offense of disobeying the writ.

The punishment that was given was one year in the county jail—six months each on two of these orders. Can any man conceive of a more heinous and more bloodthirsty character of condemnation than was given in this case? "Ah," but answer the judges, "we are not punishing for a mere technical disobedience; we are punishing for a conspiracy."

There are two matters you must consider in connection with this case, Mr. President. In the first place, he was not convicted of any conspiracy; in the second place, Judge Noyes was 2,000 miles distant and knew nothing about what was being done in San Francisco—the other conspirator.

In the next place, if any conspiracy had been entered into between these parties, under the law of the land they were entitled to a trial by jury upon a proper indictment. Therefore the conviction and this enormous punishment was upon a mere technical disobedience of a writ.

That is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] says that these are honorable men. I will concede that they are, but I must judge their acts and the feelings of humanity in their breasts by what they have done in this case. Let us see. They carefully guarded their own court from any character of insinuation.

They say, "If you ever do disobey the order of this court, it must, in order to sustain its majesty, send you to jail for one year;" and yet in the same judgment, in the same conviction, it attacks a court 2,000 miles distant, which could not defend itself, and in most scurrilous language condemns it, and convicts it without even a hearing. It argues that it must be protected and its dignity preserved by placing five or six men in prison for a mere technical disobedience of law upon a question of a different construction of a statute.

When they tried McKenzie, where did they get all the evidence? I found out this. There is the record down in the Attorney-General's office of the report of those judges when the application for a pardon was sent to them. It answers this entire inquiry. The Attorney-General saw that there was nothing in that record to convict, and he asks where they did get the record to convict Mr. McKenzie of this terrible offense. It never ought to have gone back to the judges.

It is certainly an improper policy, it seems to me, to refer a question of the character of punishment which shall be inflicted to the party who says that he is the injured individual. It is all proper enough in other cases, where judges are presumed not to be prejudiced, but inasmuch as they say the assault was upon the court, the court certainly must be the injured party; and they are to determine the amount of punishment that shall be inflicted. In their reply what do they do? They go into the Dubose case.

Mr. McKenzie was not a party to the Dubose case. The court convicted Dubose of having agreed with other attorneys who were associated with him that the writ was void and that it should not be obeyed by the parties; it was conveyed to the party in interest by their attorneys and he disobeyed the writ, although the record shows that Mr. Dubose had never seen this client or ever had anything in the world to do with him; but for his position in that case he must take his six months in prison in the county jail.

They reported on this Dubose case, and let me tell you here, Mr. President, that that Dubose case is just exactly in the same condition as all the others. Witnesses who had failed in a case before Judge Noyes were asked in that case if they did not believe that Judge Noyes was dishonest and if they did not believe that he was improperly influenced in deciding that case against them; and those persons who felt that they had possibly not been justly treated in their case very willingly gave their version of the matter, that Judge Noyes was not an honest man or he could not have decided their cases in favor of the other litigants.

Then they take several hundred pages in the Dubose case and they segregate a little evidence on this page, a line or two on another page, a sentence from another page, and they go through some 600 pages in that case, and they find enough, they say, to justify them in holding that Mr. McKenzie was guilty of contempt, although nearly every syllable of it was hearsay evidence, and all of it in a case in which Mr. McKenzie was not a party or interested in any way, shape, or manner.

Why, Mr. President, you could take the Holy Scriptures, and if you were allowed to select and garble sentence after sentence you could convict the Deity Himself from those same records; and yet this is what this record discloses which was before the Attorney-General of the attempt to besmirch the character of Alexander McKenzie.

Again, if you will read the concluding words, or nearly the concluding words, in the sentence against Alexander McKenzie, you will find that Judge Ross, who writes that opinion, almost in actual words advised the people of Alaska that they would have been justified in committing any character of hostility against Noyes. They may be honorable judges, but when I tell you they go out of the record in that method, they are doing something that a judge ought not to do.

Further than that, if this record is correct, if the statement published in the Post is correct, which was introduced by my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], then I say that record condemns the court itself. Think of a judge who has decided a case of this character out in California coming here and going to the departments and to persons and telling them he is surprised that, under the circumstances, Judge Noyes is allowed to retain his place, and that something is not done in the matter. When a judge has pronounced his judgment, then he should leave other things to the proper department to be dealt with.

Mr. PERKINS. That is only newspaper report.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is only a newspaper report, and I will not convict any judge upon a report of that character, and I doubt very much if such a statement was made by the judge.

There was another thing that was spoken of, and that was the surreptitious manner, as they claim, in which this pardon was obtained and the mighty influences that were brought to bear upon the President of the United States to secure his interposition in this matter.

Mr. President, when you have read that record there is not a man here who would not have done just the same thing that the Attorney-General did in the matter—recommend the pardon. I wish to call attention to a matter which is of record, that for the last twenty years, I believe, there have been only five cases in the United States in which the pardoning power has been exercised by the President in favor of a man convicted of contempt, and every one of those cases came from that particular court or from that section of the country, and in every one of those cases the pardon was granted because of the brutal and excessive punishment that had been inflicted. That ought to have some bearing itself, so that parties will understand it.

But the Senator said that these men are feigning sickness. Judge Noyes will never go back to Nome. Senators who are interested in seeing this scheme, this persecution, carried to its final end may feel at least the consolation that death itself will prevent Judge Noyes from ever going back to Alaska. He is in a hospital to-day in the second stages of quick consumption, persecuted to death, driven from his place, a position of honor, and is dying; and I believe, from the best information I can get, that he will never recover.

I knew Alexander McKenzie when he was injured some ten or twelve years ago. When an elevator in a hotel in New York was some eight or nine stories from the bottom the cable broke and the elevator, with all its load, went to the bottom. Mr. McKenzie at that time weighed about 245 pounds.

The shock was so great that it drove the tibia bone of the left leg, I believe, up and beyond the femur bone, tearing away the entire calf of the leg and otherwise bruising and shocking him, so that he was in a hospital for eleven months before he could be taken from his bed. It was a serious shock. His health has never been the same since, and so in this application for a pardon great stress was laid upon the fact of his physical condition. He has never been the same man since.

I was at his bedside at the Merchants' Hotel, in St. Paul, when an argument was made in the case against Judge Noyes, in which this amicus curiæ—this particular friend of the court—who prosecuted this case with a vehemence and an interest that I have never observed before in one occupying his position, stated that the court had been deceived in recommending the pardon of Alexander McKenzie, because he was at that time as well a man as ever lived, and that immediately upon being released he was erect and went to St. Paul.

As a matter of fact, Mr. McKenzie was sick and in his bed, and he has not been able to sleep more than an hour or two at a time since his incarceration. He is broken down physically and his nervous system is entirely destroyed. Any man who knows him can tell you of that to-day.

I know, furthermore, that instead of immediately leaving, before he could get out of Oakland where he was imprisoned, he was taken to a private house and there had to remain for some ten days to two or three weeks. The exact time I do not know. He was then able to get as far as Seattle, and remained there a month, and yet all of these falsehoods are hurled in this case, hurled upon the Senate, put into the record as something we must believe and take for granted. Mr. President, I protest against this injustice.

They say Judge Noyes is well. His physicians say he is not. A few days ago I received a record of his last hemorrhage, which they said was very copious, and the physicians say that in their belief he will never be able to get up again. That is enough, it seems to me, to explain away these charges of how the court has been imposed upon.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call your attention to one of the principal witnesses who has testified not only in the Noyes case but in the McKenzie case. I wish to give you a little insight into the character of the men whom these syndicates are employing to crush individuals and to drive them from their positions.

When Judge Noyes arrived in Alaska—there is no question about this—the first importunities addressed to him were that he should sell out for $20,000; that he could then get to be the attorney of the same syndicate, and he could make more money in that way. Even while he was on the boat he was so importuned, and that record you will find in the Attorney-General's Office to-day.

When he got to Nome, being unable to bribe him, being unable to rule or to bribe him in that manner, what was the next step? Mr. Knight, one of the attorneys on the opposite side of the same case before Judge Noyes, after having tried in vain to get Judge Noyes to fall into some character of a trap, then offered $1,000 to another individual by the name of Reese, who was to employ another person to swear that the judge had been purchased by this individual.

This party immediately went to Mr. Woods, the district attorney there, and reported what was being done. Mr. Woods said: "Go there and make the affidavit, get your money, and bring the affidavit and the money back here." The party went there. He made the affidavit. He received $750 for that perjured affidavit, and then asked for the affidavit from this man Knight to bring it back to the prosecuting attorney. He declined to give him the affidavit.

Mr. Knight was immediately sent for by Mr. Noyes, to whom the report had been carried. He admitted that he had the affidavit. He said, "I will bring it to your honor in about an hour, as I have to go back to my room to get it." The judge allowed him to go back to his room, and that was the last heard of him there. He immediately left. He took the affidavit and got on one of the tugs of this syndicate and was taken out to sea, and was afterwards put on board a ship some 17 miles from the coast and was taken to Seattle and there held until they could use him in San Francisco.

Not only is that corroborated by some two or three men, but the same person who made the affidavit has admitted over and over again to different individuals that this was true.

Here comes in Frost. He was implicated in this. He knew of the fact. He was the young man who was sent from the Department. Mr. Frost was working in the Department of Justice. They sent him to Alaska for the purpose of ascertaining what fees, under the circumstances, ought to be drawn by the court commissioners and other officers there. He went there for the purpose of making a report.

After Mr. Frost reached there he learned of this attempt to bribe the judge and of the attempt to secure another man to swear that he had bribed him, and he reported that fact, with all its circumstances, to the Attorney-General; and he takes one year for that. That is the penalty he must pay for having shown, as these people think, an interest in the side that was opposed to this syndicate which sought to control the entire country.

I do not find that he can be justly and rightly charged with having committed any offense whatever. He is known down here as a boy. In fact, he is but a boy, about 22 or 23 or 24 years old, I should say, of especially exemplary character. He has been in the office some time. Every one of his associates considers him a very honorable and upright young man, and yet he has to take one year in prison.

I want to take up these men's cases. Dudley Dubose—of what on earth is he convicted? Of having incidentally agreed with other attorneys that their position was right and that his clients were not bound to obey these orders. That is Dubose. He was a judge in the Territory of Montana for several years.

I speak, and I ask the Senators from Montana, who are here, to speak, for the integrity of that man as they have known his judicial acts. I have never heard any man spoken of more highly than was Dudley Dubose while he was on the bench in that district. I believe that the Georgia Senators know something about him there. No breath of suspicion was ever uttered against him until it was found that he represented an interest outside of the syndicate.

I take Mr. Frost. I have given you his record. I have given you, so far as I know, the real reason of his conviction. Let us take up the next person, Mr. Woods. I have not found that he has done anything really vicious except that he had the keys to the vault, and when they came there with a mob to get into the bank he refused to deliver over the keys. The writ was not directed to him.

It did not tell him that he was made a part of this committee to break into the bank. He was not responsible. When the marshal came to him and asked him for the keys, he declined to give them up; and he takes six months. Judge Ross says he should have had fifteen months for all of these heinous crimes committed by him.

Alexander McKenzie. I have told you what I know about him and about his record, and there is nothing in the record anywhere that is not hearsay that could convict him. I do not care where you look for it.

Mr. President, when I am speaking of this matter I want to say that I have not read this record of 3,000 pages, because that is not in the McKenzie case, and what they could have got in that case against Judge Noyes I am not speaking of, because I have not read the record, and I do not suppose I will ever get time to read all of it.

But persons who were present there tell me that the only thing of which Judge Noyes was convicted was of having issued a couple of orders called the statu quo orders, one of which was directed to the marshal, to preserve the peace and to keep matters in statu quo, and the other of which was directed to Mr. Van Orsdale, who was in charge of a body of the military up there that he do likewise. I submit these papers to any one who desires to read them, and they will find that there is nothing very criminal about them. Let me read one of them:

NOME, ALASKA, September 15, 1900.

C. L. VAWTER, United States Marshal, City.

DEAR MARSHAL: I have been able for the first time to make an examination of the original order sent down from the circuit court of appeals, and find that it will be necessary for me to enter certain orders of record here, which will be done as soon as they can be drawn and spread upon the record.

In the meantime it devolves upon you to preserve the peace and good order, so far as it is possible for you to do, and I have taken occasion to request Major Van Orsdale to render such assistance as necessary to protect life and property and to hold things in statu quo until the order can be prepared and presented to the court.

Sincerely, yours, ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge.

At this time there was a mob of workmen who were desiring to break into that bank. They were the men who had been employed by McKenzie, and no order had been made to pay them, and when they saw the gold about to go into the hands of other individuals they were there clamoring for their pay and threatening, if they did not get it, to break into those vaults and help themselves; and that was the reason for the issuance of this order.

Now, on the same day, I think, September 15, Judge Noyes wrote to Major Van Orsdale:

NOME CITY, ALASKA, September 15, 1900.

Major VAN ORSDALE, Nome City, Alaska.

MY DEAR MAJOR: After you called with Captain French this morning, I saw the original papers on file from the circuit court of appeals, and I find that it is necessary for an order to be entered by this court, which will be entered of course as soon as the same can be prepared, and such further steps will be taken as will be a full and complete compliance with the order of the circuit court of appeals.

My anxiety in this matter is to do everything in my power, and have all those whom I can in any wise control fully comply with the order of the court above, which will of course be done. In the meantime it is necessary that matters should rest in statu quo, and peace and order be preserved, and I therefore request that you render such assistance to the marshal as may be necessary to maintain that peace and quiet.

Assuring you of my desire to cooperate in every effort that is needful in order to preserve life and property, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge.

Those are the orders upon which he is convicted. The superior court says that those orders really mean that in preserving the statu quo there he is not to allow the marshal with his force to go in and take the gold, and although the marshal said he did not obey the order, that he did not do so; that it had no influence with him; that he nevertheless did go, and they took possession of the gold; nevertheless, they say that Judge Noyes showed his contempt of the court in ordering that matters be held in statu quo as near as possible.

Those are the only things upon which Judge Noyes has been convicted in this case, except a recitation elsewhere that he had been guilty of a conspiracy of some character. If he had, there is a court that can try him. If he has done so, justice demands that he be tried by a jury of his peers. Justice demands that the witnesses be brought face to face with the man they accuse, and that his fellow-citizens may pass their verdict upon him.

Mr. President, I have never felt in my life more than I have since I read this record the justice of many laws that are now being passed in onr several States restricting the power of the court to sentence for contempt without any character of trial. If there is one word of evidence to sustain them, although there may be a thousand witnesses to the contrary, there is no remedy in the world for the party convicted.

I now come to the conviction of Judge Noyes. If they are really convicting him of the conspiracy with Mr. Frost, let any Senator answer me this question: Why is Mr. Frost, this young man of twenty-odd years of age, sentenced to one year in prison, and Judge Noyes, the judge, placed there in an honorable position, where every dictate of his conscience, where every principle of honor and manhood required that he should be a fair and just man, given no sentence whatever? Why is he merely fined a thousand dollars without even an alternative? They can not imprison under this sentence. This young man can be imprisoned.

I will tell you why. It is clear to me. There is a mighty good reason. If he is not imprisoned, a writ of habeas corpus will not lie; and if they can not relieve him by writ of habeas corpus, then they have accomplished everything they have wanted to accomplish. They have blackened his character. They have killed him so far as going back to Nome is concerned, I may admit. But they did not dare imprison him, because there was a remedy if they did. But they take this stripling of a boy, whom they say was in a conspiracy with Judge Noyes, and give him twelve months' imprisonment.

They put Judge Dubose behind the bars for six months for advising his client that the writ was void. They take Hon. Thomas J. Gary, and they set him free, although they recite in this very judgment that he did advise McKenzie to disobey that order, and the record in the McKenzie case is replete with Gary's testimony over and over and over again that McKenzie acted under the advice of his attorney in not turning over the gold immediately within the three hours of time within which he could have turned it over.

Why is not Gary convicted? There are reasons back of it. The Senator from Colorado said, in substance, that if the public knew all there was the whole community would be startled by the corruption that is in Alaska. If they knew what was back of all this there would be an earthquake shock to the entire public. No man has given any good reason——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will not the Senator give us the reason and let us be shocked?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I am not going into something where it will take five weeks to get into the RECORD the entire case, but I will tell you now that this man Gary resides in California. He has a standing there. He has friends there, and they will not submit to that outrage against him, and they would make their influence felt for Gary where they would not make it felt, either before this body or elsewhere, for Judge Noyes, or Dubose, or Woods, or Mr. Frost. There is one reason. That is enough.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Certainly, if it is for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will simply ask this question: Does not the Senator feel, after what he has said, which must mean the most damnable corruption on the part of these judges, that he owes it to himself, as a member of the Senate, to inform the House of Representatives of this mass of corruption and villainy and whatever else he has in mind, which would involve the impeachment of the corrupt judges?

Mr. MCCUMBER. What charge of corruption have I made?

Mr. TILLMAN. You said it would shock the country, and I should like to be shocked.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Not on the part of those judges, but that which is back of all and controlling this Nome country and their methods.

Now, I want to say to the Senator in reference to these judges that I do not accuse them of being brought under the influence of anything but prejudice and bias. I say that this record shows that they are intensely biased; that they are prejudiced beyond all reason and all sense. I know what it means to live in the atmosphere where these charges were reiterated day by day, where the press had given them out week after week and impregnated the whole atmosphere with a feeling of hostility against Judge Noyes and against McKenzie and against everyone else who was on the opposite side of the syndicate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, if the Senator will permit me, I will suggest that if these judges are so impregnated and saturated with prejudice, and bias, and unfairness, and injustice they are not fit to sit in any court and are not fit to be charged with the responsibility of determining causes involving life, liberty, and happiness and the rights of property, and that he owes it to himself to quit attacking this court or prove something against it otherwise than by mere assertion.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have proved this prejudice from the record. I do not take the stand of the attorney from South Carolina, or base anything upon mere assertions.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I am simply a farmer.

Mr. MCCUMBER. All right, a farmer.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never been in the cesspool of courts, to have my mind debauched by selling my brains to a cause on either side for a fee, without regard to the right of the matter involved.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Nobody would accuse the Senator of being an attorney unless he did so by a slip of the tongue, and I beg the Senator's pardon if I did.

I have made no assertions here except such as I deal with by the record. I know something about the influences that have been at work in Alaska, and I have seen the effects of those influences. I have seen judgments that were unjust and worse than unjust. The Senator must agree with me, that the sentences which have been imposed have been monstrous.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina desires to place in the RECORD the entire judgment of that court. How many pages does it contain, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, if the Senator had permitted me last night, I would have had it printed and would not have taken the trouble to read it this morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. How many pages does it contain? That is all I am asking now.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will not take as long to read as you have been talking.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; how many pages?

Mr. TILLMAN. Forty-eight.

Mr. McCUMBER. Forty-eight pages of segregation of testimony here and there out of 3,000 closely printed pages and over. Can we get an honest idea from that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will when I get the floor answer more in detail, but I would rather let the judges answer for themselves. I will not interrupt the Senator any further, but his remarks a little while ago were so startling that I could not resist the temptation of asking him to specify his position.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought I had made clear to the Senator my position as to what influences and what influences only were brought to bear upon the judges. I have dealt more particularly with the influences that have purchased witnesses; that have taken out of the worst slums in Nome and Alaska men and got them to perjure themselves and bought them for the purpose of making evidence.

Now, when that comes before the higher court it may come as evidence as good and as strong as any other, but I know the men, and a verdict rendered or a judgment expressed under such testimony as that must do an injustice.

Now, we are not trying these judges here. We are not trying that judgment. I am defending Alexander McKenzie against a wrongful and an unjust attack. I do not believe that that opinion ought to go in the RECORD.

If the Senator insists on reading it, I know he can get it in the RECORD, and if he does insist on doing that injustice I shall not object to his placing it in the RECORD; but I want to say to him that if he had been treated as these men have been treated and the case was coming before his fellow-men for consideration, he would want the evidence, and the whole of it, before this body of men, rather than conclusions which I know are based for the most part upon testimony that he himself would never give the least credit to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is against that that I am protesting.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to have it distinctly understood, as I repeated, I think, three or four times yesterday, that my connection with this case is a purely accidental one, and that I injected into the debate on the bill for the increase of the salaries of the Supreme Court judges and others the statement which appeared in the Post merely as a commentary upon some abnormal, and, as I think, corrupting conditions connected with the judiciary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait, now, please, and let me get through.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the Senator may finish his sentence.

Mr. TILLMAN. I never would have opened my mouth again or broached the subject or brought the matter into the Senate but for the fact that yesterday afternoon the colleague of the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator himself injected into the debate a condition which made it necessary that these judges should be heard for themselves, through their opinion, in the RECORD, after you had brought in a special plea here, filed by an attorney in the case, and read by the other Senator from your State.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is an elegant excuse, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from South Carolina does not need any excuse to do anything he wants to do here, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. You have given your excuse; but the Senator from South Carolina stood upon this floor yesterday and charged a man as honorable as he is with being a thief and a scoundrel.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was day before yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was defended by my colleague. So, if my colleague had said nothing and if I had said nothing, but let that charge go unchallenged, he would not have offered to put this opinion in the RECORD. Well, I assure the Senator from South Carolina he can make no such charge as that against an honorable citizen of my State that he will not find it defended.

I want to tell him further that he is speaking of a man he is not acquainted with, and who will meet him, and with his wonderful courage—a man who needs to make no excuse—and he will find a man there who will meet him face to face and eye to eye; and then the Senator from South Carolina, without being shielded by these walls, can call that man a liar and thief if he desires so to do.

I think it is unjust to him, I think it is improper, to pick out of a paper a scurrilous article and hurl it against any man without any opportunity upon his part to defend himself, and I protested against that. I have listened to this for more than a year and a half, and it has been hurled in here again upon an honorable man.

I remained silent because I felt that the time was inopportune and that it should not be brought into discussion here. But by the energy of that syndicate they have forced everything into this Senate that could be of a scurrilous nature, and used it to influence and prejudice Senators here. I could not stand it any longer, and I think the Senator will give me credit for having done my duty in protesting against a thing of that kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should think I might be allowed a little more than a question after that allusion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the Senator can be allowed all the time he wants.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to repeat again that my connection with this case is purely accidental, and that I injected into a discussion on another bill an article which I found in a morning paper which to my mind disclosed a very strange and extraordinary situation. My attack, if I made any attack, was upon the Department of Justice and the Executive of the United States as neglecting their duty, if the judgment of the court in California was true; that is all.

As for Mr. McKenzie and Judge Noyes or any of these other people, I never heard of them before, except incidentally. I know nothing about them. I care nothing about them. I have expressed regret for having used this language of vituperation in regard to them, but I was merely interpreting the decision of the court.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I am very glad if he expresses regret for having used that language.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had already said that yesterday. What more does the Senator ask?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should we consider this matter when to-day it is before that same Executive Department? This whole matter is now being considered by the Attorney-General, and why should it be brought in here and the judgment of the court be placed in the RECORD?

Mr. TILLMAN. Can it hurt the judgment of the court to have the case ventilated in the Senate after the Attorney-General has it?

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is wrong it can. If it is right it may not.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a queer——

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not a question as to what the Attorney-General may do, but it is a question involving this body itself.

Now, Mr. President, I have here another record in which this decision by the judge is considered by an attorney who is not a party to this action. It is strong in terms. The language I would not have adopted myself. It does not deal with the court of appeals kindly, and yet it deals straightly with the facts.

I might ask leave to put this in the RECORD, so as to explain his record, but I think that both of them would be improper. I do not believe that the RECORD ought to be lumbered up by them; but if the Senator puts in all of that record, then it seems to me that I ought to put in the other statement as a fair and just consideration by an attorney who explains away every one of these matters, and where will we end?

Mr. TILLMAN. So far as I am concerned, the more we put into the RECORD of the infamies—I will repeat that word—somebody is guilty of infamy.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. Either the judges who have condemned these innocent men are infamous and ought to be impeached or removed, or else this man ought not to draw a salary after he has been convicted by this superior court.

Mr. McCUMBER. In Heaven's name, if you are going to try that case, try it on the evidence and introduce 3,000 pages of testimony.

Mr. TILLMAN. Put it all in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if you want to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. If you want to put it all in and the Senate will submit to it, I shall not object.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am willing that it shall circulate in your Congressional district and in your State as a document.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator knows that it does not belong in the RECORD without placing in the RECORD the facts on which it is based.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to put anything in the RECORD, if the Senate will permit it. This would have gone in yesterday if the Senator had permitted me, merely as a means of allowing other Senators the opportunity of seeing for themselves upon what the court based their conclusion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will never debauch the RECORD by offering to put in anything that I think has no appropriate place there.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have sufficient respect left. I have some lingering respect——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a question; yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will remark that I have some lingering respect for the judiciary of the United States. It is true that we on our side, or rather the party to which I belong, have criticised them in our national platform and protested against government by injunction. We have seen fit to declare that the Supreme Court of the United States fell into error and reversed itself in the income-tax cases, and we were hounded from one end of the country to the other as anarchists because we dared to imitate Lincoln and others who in the past criticised the Dred Scott decision.

But that is neither here nor there. I have some lingering respect for the judiciary of the United States, and when I hear them abused, as these three circuit judges, men of high character and men of prominence and ability and purity, so far as I know, I say it is due them that after I have brought them into this case to defend them to the end, and I am going to see that their opinion does go into the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a proper way of doing that, Mr. President. I am glad to see once in my life, and in the life of the Senator, that he is taking up the cudgel in favor of the courts of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will imitate me some time or other.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to see that change of heart taking place in the Senator from South Carolina. If he thinks that this record will be sufficient without taking the testimony on which the record is based for him to formulate an opinion in the case, then he can get all the glory that he wishes out of that record and he can satisfy his conscience that that is absolutely true, and the court has been properly cared for and protected.

But I had supposed that after reading some of the records in this case the Senator from South Carolina would feel that there was an appropriate place for the trial of this matter, and it is now before the Attorney-General on that record there. I understand that the Noyes case is going to the Supreme Court if they can get it there in any manner, and it will be determined there.

Let them pass upon the question whether or not the superior court of California is in error. But when you call a man a scoundrel because he has been convicted of a technical disobedience, then I say the Senator forgets himself and his natural impulse and good will toward all men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not wish, of course, to inject into this discussion anything so totally irrelevant as the unfinished business of the Senate, and therefore I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had finished what I had to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. I had finished my remarks. I have no objection to going on with the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have my request put to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have practically finished all I desire to say now. I may make reply if anything further is said by the Senator from South Carolina.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CUMBERLAND, MD.

Mr. WELLINGTON. As the Senator from North Dakota has concluded his remarks, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3293) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Cumberland, Md.

Mr. HALE. I should not want to agree to that if the bill is to give rise to any debate.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I shall not ask it if it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full to the Senate.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the limit of cost for construction of a public building at Cumberland, Md., from $125,000 to $175,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. Now let us go on with the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out lines 11 to 16, inclusive, on page 44.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, very much to my regret I appear in a new rôle here; that is, first as an attorney, when, as a matter of fact, I never have been in a court-house in my life except as a spectator or as a witness or a juror. Secondly, I appear in the rôle of defending the judges of one of the circuit courts of the United States. If there is any man alive who has had a poor opinion of some of those judges and has not omitted to express it when he was governor, those who care about a message I wrote on the corruptibility and infamy to which that court was willing at times, in some instances, to lend itself, can get that document.

As I stated a moment ago, and I will take the trouble to restate it, when I volunteered the other morning to read an article from the morning paper here, which is a respectable journal, which reflected in scathing terms upon an anomalous condition existing by which we found that men who were practically removed from office by the court above them were still drawing their salaries, I felt that I had done enough.

But I was attacked yesterday afternoon in the way I was by three Senators. I can usually attend to one man in this body, but when they came at me in droves you know I got a little nervous. I was a little astonished at something that happened yesterday afternoon.

For instance, my good friend—I do not speak in any perfunctory way—the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] gave me a very brotherly lecture on my wrongdoing, my errors of the head, not of the heart, he was kind enough to say.

Then later on the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. HOAR] came to the assistance of the two Senators from North Dakota and gave an obiter dictum of his own to the effect that having been told by a dead colleague of ours, whom we all loved and respected, that he had examined this matter and it was all one way, etc., and so on, and this was a moot question that ought never to have been brought here, he proceeded to lecture me in a kind and fatherly way upon my shortcomings. Then later, when I endeavored to do these judges simple justice by letting them speak for themselves in their own opinion, in which the evidence upon which that opinion rests is rehearsed, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] felt constrained to interpose an objection.

I confess, Mr. President, that during my seven years here I have never known a similar instance of discourtesy. The Senator, I presume, supposed that I was actuated by some partisan or sinister motive in endeavoring to get this document in the RECORD, while I declare to you upon my honor, Senators, that my sole purpose was to render accessible to you the facts upon which the article in the Post rests, and to enable you this morning to understand it without further discussion. So far as I was concerned, I was through with it if they had let the document go in; but as they did not, and I could not get it in in any way last night, there is no way but for me to read it.

Mr. CULLOM. Print it.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; let the Senator read it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is rather a tiresome job, and the Senator from Maine, I know, has the fidgets, something he does not often get.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated that I have no objection to its going into the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I do not often get tied up in this way. If it will serve the Senator's purpose, I judge from what was indicated by the Senator from North Dakota that probably no objection will be made to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did state that I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. If it can be printed in the RECORD without reading it will bridge over the time.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I said that if the Senator insists on having it put in the RECORD I would withdraw the objection. So if he does insist I withdraw it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit to Senators, after the special plea of the attorney, which was read by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] yesterday evening, and after the additional special plea which has been presented this morning by the other Senator from North Dakota, whether it would be fair to the judges if their attorney here, their defender, did not read their opinion and comment a little on it. In other words, would I be doing my duty by my clients, these three distinguished jurists in California, in defense of whom I unexpectedly appear here?

Mr. HALE. The relation of a client to attorney is a very sacred one; I recognize that.

Mr. TILLMAN. With that view, then, I shall proceed to read a part of it. I do not know that I will read it all, but still I feel constrained as a matter of duty to these judges, whom unexpectedly I have gotten into hot water, to try to cool it a little.

There is one phrase that I noted down here a moment ago, uttered by the Senator from North Dakota who has just taken his seat, which rather sets my teeth on edge. He said I had stabbed somebody in the back, when I have expressed time and again my regret that commenting upon a statement of facts coming from a court I had interpreted their words into declaring that the men whom they had convicted and condemned were scoundrels and thieves.

Possibly I ought not to have said it. They may be innocent. These judges may be the culprits. These judges may be tyrants. These judges may be debauched, and it may be that they have been bribed. Therefore, if it will do the two Senators from North Dakota any good, I desire here and now to apologize to these men who may have been imprisoned unjustly and whose lives have been taken, who are on beds of sickness with consumption and every other ill, whose honor has been destroyed, whose property is gone, and all that kind of thing—I will apologize to them and withdraw all opprobrious epithets. Can I do any more?

I hope nobody supposes for a minute it is because my friend who has just taken his seat declared there was some blood-and-thunder man here by the name of McKenzie, who will meet me outside of the Chamber and hold me to personal account on account of what I have said. I have been going through the world for fifty-four years, and I have never yet shunned any encounter of any kind very much. I have never been noted for police-court proceedings or anything of that sort. I do not suppose that anybody here imagines that I am terrorized by that threat of my friend.

I mention that merely of my own accord, to translate into plainer language what I tried to express three times yesterday. I spoke unthoughtedly, without proper consideration. I had no purpose or intention of doing more, as I said, than to inject into the debate on the salary bill a commentary which, by the way, I will elaborate a little now by pointing out if this great American Government, with its machinery, can not provide honest judges and honest district attorneys and other officers in Alaska, where our language is spoken, and you are entering upon a programme which involves sending into the Pacific judges and everything else who have full sway to tyrannize over and rob and oppress people who do not speak our language, is it not a commentary on the situation which should give you gentlemen who are hell-bent on your programme a little pause?

If we can not protect American miners; if we can not get honest judges in Alaska; if we can not send, even from the Department of Justice, a trusted agent but what as soon as he gets in that atmosphere he becomes debauched and is bribed and bought to lend himself to the schemes of this so-called syndicate of which we hear so much, what will we do when syndicate after syndicate has been turned loose, as you propose to do, in the Philippines?

This ought to be said on the Philippine tariff bill instead of on the deficiency bill; but we get so mixed up here sometimes that you will pardon this seeming inconsistency, or rather the irrelevancy, of my utterances.

Perhaps I ought not to mention it, but I will do it in illustration of what I am just saying. I will read another extract from a paper. I think we will have to give a day to newspaper discussions and clippings, to see if we can not put a little mustard on the backs of some men and make them a little more amenable to reason.

I hold in my hand yesterday's New York Sun. "The Sun shines for all," it claims; and everybody knows that if there is a dyed-in-the-wool, villainous, and venomous Republican paper in the United States, it is this New York Sun. [Laughter.] Being, therefore, necessarily a friend of the Republican party and the Administration, who would have supposed that the Sun would have been guilty of this attack on its friends?

CONVICTED FELON FOR OFFICE—NOMINATED AND CONFIRMED AS UNITED STATES MARSHAL FOR ARIZONA.

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 3.

Great surprise has been caused here at the receipt of news from Washington that the Senate on Thursday last confirmed the nomination of Ben Daniels, if that is really his name, as United States marshal of Arizona. His career as swindler, gambler, and desperado was known to certain people in Washington before his appointment, but it seems hardly credible that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary—

I am sorry its honored chairman is not present, who read me such a lecture yesterday evening—who passed upon his nomination, knew that he has a prison record as a convict. But here is a page copied from the description book of convicts in the United States penitentiary at Laramie City, Wyo., which is of record in the office of the United States marshal in this city:

Name, Benjamin Daniels; registered No. 86; received November 29, 1879; crime, larceny—

Not an honorable crime, like shooting a man in hot blood, but stealing—sentence, two years and return of stolen property; age, 27; nativity, American; occupation, laborer; height, 5 feet 10 inches; complexion, fair; hair, dark brown; eyes, brown. Has wife? No. Has father? Yes—

He was obliged to have a father, of course—

Religion? Methodist. Habits of life? Regular. Education? Common. Relations? Address Mrs. M. C. Eddy, Lyndon, Osage County, Kans. Marks, scars. Is a large, strong-built man, weighing 165 pounds. Has a thin face, large Roman nose, bushy eyebrows, and ears stand out straight from head. Nose has been broken and the lobe of right ear is missing. The letters B. D. in india ink on his right arm. A small scar under the right knee. Small scar on left knee. A large round scar on left shoulder blade. Is pockmarked slightly on body and considerably on face. Has had smallpox. Conduct while in confinement, good. Discharged, August 28, 1883. Allowed good time.

In this case it was ordered and adjudged that the judgment be dissolved and a new trial ordered, and that defendant be held for safekeeping until a new trial can be had. Reconvicted June 30, and transferred to page 33.

If we have got the wrong sow by the ear, it is not a bit of trouble to have the real marshal, who has been confirmed by this august body and its Judiciary Committee, exonorated. Then I will apologize to the real marshal and give all my attention to this man, whoever he may be.

But I just want to call attention—I will not read any more, but will simply insert the whole of it in the RECORD—I want to call attention to the fact that the Judiciary Committee, too, sometimes makes mistakes, as do all of us occasionally in our work here, who are not always able to sift to the bottom the characters and the antecedents of the men whose names are sent in here.

We take it for granted that those who recommend them for office would not put off on the President a man of this type; and if he is thus deceived that, as soon as he finds it out, he will himself correct the wrong that has been done him and the public service by putting in office a man like this to go to another Territory. What a pretty specimen—if we have got the right Daniels—to be nominated here for marshal and sent out there. If you Senators who are in power and who are responsible for these things in recommending your friends are not a little more careful, I am afraid you will bring this Administration into some disrepute.

Now, I will get back to my mutton; but I will first give anybody who chooses the opportunity to defend Mr. Daniels. I presume the Senator from Wyoming will be on me next, or possibly somebody from Kansas or Nebraska or somewhere else out there where this man originally came from will be getting up tomorrow and calling me to account for having read an article from a reputable newspaper describing this man correctly; and I will have to meet it. I do not like to be doing things of this kind, but somebody has got to hold up the looking-glass so that you Republicans may see yourselves as others see you.

Having said that much, I do not believe I have the heart to impose on the good nature of the Senate any longer. This case of Noyes is really not here, and I did not bring it here with any view or purpose or desire of having Mr. Noyes or anybody concerned in this matter discussed or defended or attacked. I did not intend to; so help me God, I did not.

I was merely endeavoring to throw some additional light on the question of the judiciary, as to what kind of men we have got, and the failure of the Executive department and of the Attorney-General to do their duty. If it will take a year and a half—and it appears that already more than a year has gone by—before we can have it determined as to whether three judges of the circuit court in San Francisco are a lot of scoundrels and tyrants, it is incumbent on the Attorney-General to hustle a little.

He seems to take it very leisurely when he comes to dealing with the trusts, and he never has found any law under which he could bring an indictment against them. My distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. HOAR] said the other day he hoped to see some act passed by this Congress which would make it the duty of somebody else or put it in the power of somebody else to bring indictments against the trusts; that now the only man who is allowed under the law to indict them is the Attorney-General; that there was a bar, so to speak, against litigation by parties who chose to attack corporations or syndicates or combinations or monopolies, and that he hoped to see a change. I hope to, but I do not look for any.

As I before said, I wish the Attorney-General would get through with this job of determining whether or not these three circuit judges are corrupt or have made a mistake, or whether the court is right and those people ought to be punished, and then stop their salaries. That is all.

I will ask that this judgment and opinion of the court in the case under discussion or under trial shall be inserted in the RECORD without any further remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the document which he sends to the Secretary's desk may be printed in the RECORD as part of his remarks. Is there objection on the part of the Senate? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The document referred to is as follows:

Nos. 701, 702, 703, and 744. In the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. In the matter of Arthur H. Noyes. In the matter of Thomas J. Geary. In the matter of Joseph K. Wood. In the matter of C. A. S. Frost. Opinions and judgment. E. S. Pillsbury, amicus curiæ. P. J. McLaughlin and F. J. Heney, for Arthur H. Noyes and C. A. S. Frost. J. G. Maguire, for Thomas J. Geary. Joseph K. Wood, in propria persona. Before Gilbert, Ross, and Morrow, circuit judges.

Gilbert, circuit judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

The affidavit upon which the order to show cause was directed to Arthur H. Noyes charges that on July 23, 1900, said Arthur H. Noyes, as judge of the district court of Alaska, second division, at Nome, Alaska, signed an order in the action entitled "Chipps vs. Lindeberg et al.," appointing Alexander McKenzie receiver of property described in the complaint, which consisted of a placer mining claim, and enjoined the defendants, who were then in possession of the claim, from working the same, and that on the same date made similar orders in four other similar causes pending, viz, Melsing vs. Tornanses, Comptois vs. Anderson, Rodgers vs. Kjellman, and Webster vs. Nakkeli et al.; that thereupon the receiver took possession of the claims and proceeded to mine the same, and extracted therefrom gold dust of the value of more than $100,000.

That the defendants in each of the said cases presented to the said Arthur H. Noyes, judge of said court, a petition for the allowance of an appeal from said order, together with an undertaking on appeal and assignment of errors, but that the said Arthur H. Noyes refused to grant said petition or to allow such appeal. That thereafter, on August 29, 1900, Hon. W. W. Morrow, one of the judges of this court, made orders allowing appeals in said cases, and directing that writs of supersedeas issue thereon out of this court, directed to the said Alexander McKenzie and the said Arthur H. Noyes, commanding the said Noyes to desist from any further proceedings on account of said orders and commanding the said McKenzie to restore to the defendants in said cases all property which he had taken or received as receiver.

That on September 14, 1900, certified copies of said orders allowing such appeal in some of said cases, and writs of supersedeas in all of said cases, were filed in the office of the said district court at Nome, and certified copies of the writs of supersedeas were served upon said Arthur H. Noyes, and also upon the said receiver, and demand was made upon the latter that he return to the defendants in said actions the gold and gold dust which he had taken from the claims described in the complaints in said actions, which gold dust was then in his possession, and was of the value of about $200,000. That said receiver refused to deliver said gold dust or any part thereof to the defendants in said actions and refused to comply with the writs of supersedeas, whereupon application was made by the respective defendants through their counsel to the said Arthur H. Noyes for orders directing the enforcement of the writs of supersedeas which had been issued by this court, and that the said Arthur H. Noyes then and there declined to make such orders, saying that the matter was out of his hands.

That on September 15, 1900, the defendants in said cases, through their counsel, again requested said Arthur H. Noyes to make an order directing the enforcement of the said writs of supersedeas, but the said Noyes then and there stated and declared that the orders appointing the receiver were not appealable; that the defendants were not entitled to an appeal. That on said last-named date, the said Noyes gave instructions to the United States marshal to place a guard over the vaults containing the gold dust and to prevent access thereto by any person. That the object of said order was to defeat the execution of the said writs of supersedeas.

That on said date the said Arthur H. Noyes in the presence of T. J. Geary said to the said marshal: "Go ahead and keep possession of the gold dust, and do not let McKenzie or any of the parties go near it," and that at the same time the said Noyes stated in the presence of said Geary that he did not think the order appointing McKenzie as receiver was an appealable order, but that, assuming that it was, the only supersedeas that could be effected was one staying proceedings, and that on the record as it was, there was no justification for the defendants demanding the return of the property. That on October 6, 1900, in the case of Chipps vs. Lindeberg et al., the plaintiff, by his attorneys, Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, filed a motion in said district court of the district of Alaska at Nome, for an order of the court restraining the defendants in said case from working the placer mining claim in controversy therein, and from taking out of the jurisdiction of said court any gold taken therefrom, and that said motion was based upon an affidavit of the plaintiff which referred to the writ of supersedeas as "an alleged writ of supersedeas from the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit."

That upon such motion the said Arthur H. Noyes, judge of said court, ordered that the defendants in said action show cause on October 8 why an injunction should not issue restraining them from further working the claim and from deporting from the jurisdiction of the court any gold dust taken therefrom. That upon October 10 the said Arthur H. Noyes made an order upon such application for an injunction enjoining the defendants in said action from removing any gold dust taken from said placer claim to any place outside of the Nome precinct, district of Alaska. That the conduct of the said Arthur H. Noyes after the appointment of the said receiver, and above described, was for the purpose of interfering with and preventing the enforcement of said writs of supersedeas.

The answer of Arthur H. Noyes admits that he refused to make an order requiring the receiver to return the gold dust to the defendants, but avers that he did not believe he could or should make such an order, and that all matters pertaining to the receivership had passed beyond his control except such orders as he was required to make by the terms of the writ. That he did not state as a reason for refusing to make an order requiring the receiver to deliver the gold dust that the orders appointing the receiver were not appealable, but admits that it was his judgment and opinion that such orders were not appealable. He denies that he ordered the marshal to allow no one, especially McKenzie, or the parties interested to have access to the vaults in which the gold dust held by the receiver was deposited or that he stated to the said marshal to go ahead and keep possession of the gold dust.

He admits that he stated that the only order he could make in such cases was one staying proceedings; that the writ of supersedeas directed him to stay all proceedings in the receivership matter and to desist and refrain from any further acts in connection therewith, and he alleges that the injunction of October 10 was made upon the belief and in the full conviction that such order was within his power as a judge in the said case then pending for the reason that the appeals had been taken only from the orders appointing the receiver, leaving all other matters in said causes pending in the district court for further proceedings. That in all the matters set forth in the charges he acted in good faith and in full respect for the authority, writs, and orders of this court, and he denies that he sought to interfere with or prevent the enforcement of the writs of supersedeas.

Of the evidence which was taken upon the issues raised by the answer of Arthur H. Noyes to the order to show cause, a large proportion consists of testimony concerning the attitude of the judge toward the litigation then pending before him in the cases which are hereinafter referred to as well as in other cases in which McKenzie was receiver or was interested. Much of it tends strongly to show the existence of a criminal conspiracy between some of these respondents and McKenzie and others to use the court and its process for their private gain and to unlawfully deprive the owners of mines who were in possession thereof of their property under the forms of law.

Concerning this portion of the evidence, it is not necessary to express an opinion. The respondents are on trial here for the offense of contempt of the process of this court and for no other offense. Reference to the evidence of their misconduct will be made only for the purpose of finding the animus which actuated them in the commission of the acts with which they stand charged. We find it unnecessary to discuss all of this evidence in detail. We shall assume as proven none of the material facts which are testified to except such as are not disputed, or are corroborated by other evidence, or are so well sustained by the proofs as to leave in our minds no reasonable doubt of their truth.

Judge Noyes arrived at Nome on July 19, 1900, in company with other officers of his court and in company with Alexander McKenzie. Prior to going to Nome, McKenzie had been engaged in organizing the Alaska Gold Mining Company, a corporation, for the purpose of engaging in mining at Nome, and in that connection had made the acquaintance of O. P. Hubbard, a member of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, attorneys at Nome, Alaska. On the day of his arrival at Nome, McKenzie went to the office of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume and had an interview with Mr. Hume, in which he told the latter that Hubbard had transferred to him, McKenzie, his interest in the litigation which involved the right of possession of the Anvil Creek mining claims, and that Hubbard had represented to him that the other members of the firm would do the same—that is, would transfer to his corporation the contingent interest they had in those claims.

The contingent interest of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume was a one-half interest in the claims in case the plaintiffs prevailed. Hume testified that McKenzie further represented to him and to Beeman that he controlled the appointment of the judge and the district attorney, and that if they desired to have those cases heard it would be absolutely necessary to transfer their interest to his corporation, and receive in lieu certificates of stock, and he testified that at the same time McKenzie demanded that a one-fourth interest of the business of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume be transferred to Joseph K. Wood, the district attorney, and that Wood become a silent partner in the firm, and stated that if all this were assented to Hume should become deputy district attorney. The evidence shows that Hume and his partners agreed to these suggestions, and Wood became a silent partner in the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, and that Hume was appointed deputy district attorney.

All this was done on Thursday, July 19. The evidence shows that on the same day, and immediately after making these arrangements, McKenzie took Hume and Beeman aside and demanded that an entire one-fourth interest of the firm be placed in his, McKenzie's, name, and that he receive one-fourth of the profits. Hume testified that this was assented to on the next morning, after much objection and hesitation, and only after McKenzie had threatened him that if he refused his business and the interests of his clients would be ruined. He testified further that partnership articles were drawn up and signed in accordance with the agreement. Wood admitted that the agreement was entered into whereby he and McKenzie were each to have a one-fourth interest in the firm, but he expressed the belief that it was never acted upon or carried out, so far as McKenzie's interest was concerned.

At that time Hubbard, Beeman & Hume were attorneys for the plaintiffs in four actions at law that were pending concerning the title to four of the best placer-mining claims on Anvil Creek. Immediately after entering into the partnership agreement, McKenzie directed the firm to get all their stenographers at work preparing papers for applications for the appointment of receivers in those actions. This was done in the four cases then pending, to wit: Rodgers vs. Kjellman, involving Claim No. 2 below Discovery on Anvil Creek; Comptois vs. Anderson, involving Claim No. 3 above Discovery; Melsing vs. Tornanses, involving Claim No. 10 above Discovery; and Webster vs. Nakkeli, involving a claim on Nakkeli Gulch, tributary to Anvil Creek; and a new action was brought, Chipps vs. Lindeberg et al., involving Discovery Claim on Anvil Creek.

The firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume employed three stenographers, and were busily engaged until the afternoon of Monday, July 23, in making out papers. Bills in equity and affidavits in aid of the pending actions at law were prepared in all these causes except in Rodgers vs. Kjellman. In that case the receiver was appointed upon a complaint in ejectment and affidavits. In Melsing vs. Tornanses the bill was not verified. While the papers were being prepared, McKenzie was constantly in and about the office of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, urging haste. On Monday morning, July 23, he had a wagon waiting in front of the office of the firm for the purpose of conveying himself and his keepers to take possession of the mines as soon as he should be appointed receiver.

Monday afternoon there were two such wagons waiting. These facts are shown by the testimony of several disinterested witnesses, one of whom, Arthur M. Pope, testified that as early as 9 or half past 9 o'clock in the morning his attention was directed to teams standing ready to convey McKenzie and others to the mines on Anvil Creek, and that on that day, or perhaps the day before, he had received information from Hubbard, Beeman & Hume that McKenzie would be appointed receiver of those mines. Between half past 5 and 6 o'clock in the evening of Monday, July 23, the papers having been prepared, but not filed, Mr. Hume called upon Judge Noyes at his hotel, presented his papers, and asked for the appointment of a receiver in the five suits.

Mr. Hume testified that he started to read the affidavit of the plaintiff in one of the cases, whereupon the judge said it was not necessary to read the affidavit, and asked for the orders, and that the witness then stated that he desired to recommend for appointment Alexander McKenzie, to which the judge replied that he had known McKenzie for many years; that he was a very good man, and that, as he was a stranger in the country, he would prefer to appoint some one with whom he was acquainted, and thereupon he appointed McKenzie receiver of all of said mining claims, with instructions to take immediate possession of the same and work them, and to preserve the gold dust and proceeds of the claims, subject to the further orders of the court, and all persons then in possession of the claims were ordered to deliver to the receiver immediate possession, control, and management thereof, and were enjoined from in any manner interfering with the mining or working of the claims or the receiver's control or management thereof.

The amount of the bond required of the receiver was in each case only $5,000, and this in the face of the showing made by the plaintiff's affidavit in one of the cases that the daily output of the mine involved therein was $15,000. Immediately after the orders were signed, and before any bonds were filed and before the papers were filed by the clerk or the summons had been issued, the receiver proceeded to take possession of the five placer claims involved in those suits. The appointment of a receiver in these cases was a complete surprise to the defendants therein.

Judge Charles S. Johnson, formerly the district judge of Alaska, who was an attorney for certain of the defendants, testified that in a conversation he had with Judge Noyes on his arrival the latter had stated that his court would not be open for business until his return from St. Michaels; that he would go there in a few days and there formally open his court and spread his commission on the records and return; that he would keep a clerk or deputy at Nome until he returned, but added: "He will transact no business until I return from St. Michaels." The fourth section of the act of June 6, 1900, under which Judge Noyes was appointed, provided that the judge of the Second district of Alaska should reside at St. Michaels, and it authorized him to hold court elsewhere in the district upon giving at least thirty days' notice. (Stats., 321-323.)

This notice was given by Judge Noyes by publication. It was dated July 21, 1900, and gave notice that a special term of the district court would be held at Nome on Monday, August 22, 1900, or as soon thereafter as practicable and convenient. Upon learning that a receiver had been appointed, the attorneys for the defendants in those cases endeavored to obtain an order setting aside the appointment. Samuel Knight, an attorney for certain of the defendants, prepared papers and called upon the judge on July 24, and requested that his motion be set for hearing immediately or as soon as possible. The judge replied that the matter could not then be taken up, nor until after his return from St. Michael. Mr. Knight urged that the matter be set for hearing at 3 o'clock that afternoon, to which the judge replied that the notice was too short.

Judge Noyes declined to give the order or to set the cases for hearing, whereupon Mr. Knight said he would serve a notice on Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, and would be there at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. At 3 o'clock counsel appeared, the motions were argued, and judge Noyes announced that he would render his decision on the following Monday. On the following Monday, July 30, he made no decision. Two days later he left Nome for St. Michael. After he returned, the motions were reargued on August 3 and 4. On August 10 they were decided adversely to the defendants. W. H. Metson and Judge Kenneth M. Jackson, on behalf of the defendants whom they represented, made similar motions and efforts to obtain orders setting aside the appointment of the receiver in their cases.

In the meantime, on July 25, Judge Noyes made an order in the case of Chipps vs. Lindeberg et al., which should receive more than casual notice. W. H. Metson, one of the attorneys for the defendants in that case, hearing that the receiver had taken possession of the personal effects of the defendants therein, went on July 24 to the judge and asked him to make an order so construing the order of the 23d as to permit the defendants to remain in the possession of their tents and their personal property, and thereupon the judge so ordered. On July 25, Mr. Metson, having heard that the judge had made a statement that he had been imposed upon in making the order of the previous day, went to the judge and stated what he had heard, and remarked that he was not in the habit of imposing upon judges and did not intend so to do. To which Judge Noyes replied: "Your people are preventing the receiver from working the Discovery claim. I am going to tie your people up all around. I am going to make an order which will take everything away from them."

Mr. Metson protested against this and requested the judge not to take so drastic a remedy, and drew his attention to the fact that the complaint called for the possession of the mine only, and he argued that to take away the tools and supplies and personal effects of the defendants would be a great injustice. To which Judge Noyes replied: "I have been imposed upon, and I am going to tie them up." Mr. Metson testified positively to these facts. Judge Noyes admitted that portions of Metson's testimony are true, and made uncertain denial of the remainder. We entertain no doubt, in view of all the facts and circumstances and the nature of Judge Noyes's own testimony, that the interview occurred substantially as testified to by Mr. Metson. He testified further that he requested the judge to refrain from making such an order, and that the judge declared his purpose to make it, and told him if he got anything he would have to see McKenzie about it.

Judge Noyes denied that he referred Metson to McKenzie. The order which was made on July 25 was entitled an "order enlarging the powers of receiver." Among other things it directed the receiver to "take possession of all sluice boxes, pumps, excavations, machinery, pipe, plant, boarding houses, tents, buildings, safes, scales, and all personal property, fixed and movable, gold, gold dust, and precious metals, money boxes, or coin, and all personal property upon said claim." The receiver took possession of the tents and the beds of the men, the men's own personal property, the boxes of gold dust belonging to the men, the gold dust taken from other claims belonging to the defendants, the contents of the safe, and the time books of other claims which the defendants were working, and there was no redress until some six weeks later, when the receiver, on the advice of his counsel, surrendered a few of the things so taken.

On August 15 the defendants applied to Judge Noyes for orders allowing them appeals to this court from the orders appointing the receiver, and accompanied their application in each case with bonds and assignments of error, and presented bills of exceptions. The applications were denied. After the appeals had been subsequently allowed by the order of the Hon. W. W. Morrow, one of the judges of this court, and copies of the orders of the judge and the writs of supersedeas thereupon issued had arrived at Nome on September 14, Marshal Vawter on that day served the writs upon Judge Noyes and upon the receiver. Mr. Knight called upon the Judge on the same day and stated to him that he had come to see about getting an order to put into effect the writs of supersedeas, and the Judge said to him:

"I can do nothing about this order. This litigation has caused me a great deal of worry. My hands are tied. The court has taken the whole matter out of my hands. You gentlemen have got to fight this thing out among yourselves." And he added, "I shall make no order; it is not my duty to do so; it is not within my province or right to do so."

On the following day Mr. Knight made a similar application for such order, and presented to the judge a form of order to which, he testified, the judge replied that he had talked with Mr. McKenzie, and had come to the conclusion that the writs were void, and added: "You have laid a very suspicious emphasis upon the injunctional part of these orders. You are not entitled to an appeal, and your record shows evidence of a great deal of haste."

Judge Noyes further stated to Mr. Knight that he was having an order prepared. Cornelius L. Vawter, who was the marshal of the district court of Alaska, second division, in the fall and summer of 1900, testified that on September 14 he served copies of the writs upon Judge Noyes and McKenzie, and that later in the same day he called upon the judge and asked if there was anything that could be done in relation to the writs, and that the judge answered that he was not going to do anything; McKenzie could do as he pleased. The marshal testified that on the following day, while he was in consultation with Major Van Orsdale, he received from Judge Noyes the following letter:

NOME, ALASKA, September 15, 1900.

C. L. VAWTER, United States Marshal, City.

DEAR MARSHAL: I have been able for the first time to make an examination of the original order sent down from the circuit court of appeals, and find that it will be necessary for me to enter certain orders of record here, which will be done as soon as they can be drawn and spread upon the record. In the meantime, it devolves upon you to preserve the peace and good order so far as it is possible for you to do, and I have taken occasion to request Major Van Orsdale to render such assistance as necessary to protect life and property, and to hold things in statu quo until the order can be prepared and presented to the court.

Sincerely, yours, ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge.

The marshal testified that in connection with the letter and after he had put a posse of two soldiers in the bank, he had a conversation with Judge Noyes in which he told the judge what he had done to guard the bullion, and that the judge remarked: "That is right. Hold it there. Don't let this crowd get it; don't let anybody get it; keep the guard on there until further orders." The marshal testified further that it was rumored at that time that the Lane people and the Pioneer Mining Company (the defendants in the Anvil Creek cases) were going to go in and take the bullion out, and that their attorneys had requested him to have the writs enforced and that he informed Judge Noyes of this later and that the judge said it was right "not to enforce them; not to let them get the bullion."

Marshal Vawter testified that later at St. Michael he had a conversation with the judge in which he said to the latter: "There is no danger but what you are going to obey the writ of the appellate court, is there?" and the judge answered: "Don't you think it. In the first place I have got a right to interpret those writs. They have not put up bonds enough; I don't know whether they are genuine or not. I don't know who Frank Monckton is; I am not going to take any clerk of the court's word for it. In any event the Supreme Court will knock them out when it gets there." Judge Noyes contradicted the testimony of the marshal in regard to this conversation and denied that he made the remarks which the marshal attributed to him.

There is a partial corroboration of the marshal's testimony by that of George V. Borchsenius, the clerk of the court, who testified that he was present during a part of the conversation at St. Michael, and that he heard some remark of Judge Noyes concerning Mr. Monckton, the clerk of the circuit court of appeals. It should be noted that Marshal Vawter at the time when he testified was no longer marshal of the court and that his feeling toward Judge Noyes was unfriendly, and that he and the judge were not upon speaking terms. Chas. D. French, captain in the United States Army, Seventh Infantry, testified that he was on duty at Nome in August, September, and October, 1900; that he had an interview with Judge Noyes on September 15, in which reference was made to the writs of supersedeas and that he asked Judge Noyes what was going to be done about it, to which Judge Noyes answered that he understood it that the writs required him not to do anything whatever. Captain French further testified:

"There was some further conversation; he directed me not to issue any executive order in reference to these writs, as I understood it. * * * I understood I was required not to undertake the execution of the writs. I was captain of Company K, Seventh Infantry, which was engaged in controlling the town, and was, as I understood it, held responsible for keeping the peace."

Captain French later testified that when the judge forbade him to issue an executive order, he understood it to refer to the writs of supersedeas, and he so informed Major Van Orsdale, his superior officer.

Major Van Orsdale, who was in command of the military forces at Nome, testified that on the morning of September 15 Kenneth M. Jackson, one of the attorneys for the defendants in the Anvil Creek cases, called upon him and told him that the receiver had refused to comply with the writs of supersedeas, and that there was danger of serious trouble, as a vigilance committee was being or was about to be organized for the purpose of taking possession of the properties that McKenzie was responsible for as receiver, and that he was very anxious that matters should proceed in a lawful way; that if the committee got started there was no knowing where it would end, and very serious trouble would probably result, possibly bloodshed.

Kenneth M. Jackson testified that what he told Major Van Orsdale was that McKenzie had refused to obey the writs and that the marshal had refused to enforce them, and that the defendants were afraid that McKenzie and the plaintiffs would remove the gold dust and get away with it, and that if they did attempt to take the gold dust out of the bank some one would get hurt and that he wanted the assistance of the military to enforce the writs. We have no hesitation in accepting Mr. Jackson's statement as embodying the truth of the situation. It is fully sustained by the circumstances and by the general facts in the case as testified to by other witnesses. There was no danger of a general riot or of the formation of a vigilance committee, and there was no danger of bloodshed unless either the plaintiffs or the defendants or the receiver should attempt by force to remove the gold dust from the safe-deposit vault where it was stored.

It is true there were miners in Nome at that time who had been working for the receiver whose wages had not been paid, and who were clamorous for payment, but there is no credible evidence that they contemplated or threatened the use of violence to take the gold dust or for any purpose, or that there was talk of a vigilance committee. Major Van Orsdale testified that he went to see Judge Noyes, together with Captain French; that he reported to the judge what he had heard about the writs and the danger of riot and bloodshed, and that the judge informed him that the matter had been taken entirely out of his hands, and that he did not know what Mr. McKenzie was going to do about it, but if the matter was brought to his attention he would inform Mr. McKenzie that he should comply with the writ, or words to that effect. That afternoon about 4 o'clock Major Van Orsdale received the following letter from Judge Noyes:

NOME CITY, ALASKA, September 15, 1900.

Major VAN ORSDALE, Nome City, Alaska.

MY DEAR MAJOR: After you called with Captain French this morning I saw the original papers on file from the circuit court of appeals, and I find that it is necessary for an order to be entered by this court, which will be entered, of course, as soon as the same can be prepared, and such further steps will be taken as will be a full and complete compliance with the order of the circuit court of appeals. My anxiety in this matter is to do everything in my power, and have all those whom I can in anywise control fully comply with the order of the court above, which, of course, will be done. In the meantime it is necessary that matters should rest in statu quo, and peace and order be preserved, and I therefore request that you render such assistance to the marshal as may be necessary to maintain that peace and quiet.

Assuring you of my desire to cooperate in every effort that is needful in order to preserve life and property, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge.

Judge Noyes testified that the letter to Major Van Orsdale was written in pursuance of an interview that he had previously had with Major Van Orsdale, when the latter had called upon him and told him there was going to be a disturbance and an attack upon the bank, or that a mob was likely to assemble and that there was going to be bloodshed.

On September 17 W. H. Metson made formal application in court for an order directing the receiver to comply with the writs of supersedeas in his cases, and the judge answered, saying that he was preparing a formal order, which would be filed.

On September 19, Mr. Metson and Judge Johnson made in open court a motion for the enforcement of the writ of supersedeas in the Chipps case, and accompanied the motion with an affidavit that McKenzie had extracted $130,000 from the mine which he refused to deliver, and they asked the court to make an order on the writ of supersedeas that he transfer that property to the defendants. Judge Noyes being then engaged in hearing a trial, directed that the trial proceed, and made no answer to the application which was thus made. It appears that no order was made in open court by Judge Noyes in any of these cases at any time, but Mr. Metson testified that subsequently he found among the papers in the Chipps case orders which bore date September 17, which were not filed and which contained, indorsed upon them in pencil in the handwriting of Wheeler, the private secretary of the judge, the memorandum "not to be filed."

The order, after setting forth certain recitals, concludes as follows: "Ordered, that all further proceedings herein in relation to said interlocutory order of this district court of said 23d day of July, 1900, be, and are hereby, stayed pending the said appeal from said interlocutory order to the circuit court of appeals." Similar orders were made in the other cases, all bearing date September 17, 1900. Judge Noyes testified that these orders were made to express his understanding of the requirements of the writs of supersedeas, so far as they were directed to him, and that he did not make or authorize the memorandum "not to be filed."

The writs contained the following: "And that you, said Alexander McKenzie, do forthwith return unto the said defendants the possession of any and all property of which you took possession under and by virtue of said order, and that you do make return of this supersedeas, together with your acts and doings thereon, to said district court for such district of Alaska, second division, as you will answer the contrary at your peril, and you, the judge of said district court for the District of Alaska, second division, are hereby commanded to stay any and all proceedings which may have issued as aforesaid upon said order, and to stay any and all further proceedings in relation to said order and the appointment of a receiver in this case, pending the appeal last aforesaid in this court."

Judge Noyes testifies that he was not advised of the fact that Judge Morrow had approved the form of the writs of supersedeas or that he had taken other action than to make the orders upon which said writs were issued, and that taking the writs in connection with those orders and the amount of the bonds upon which the appeals had been allowed, which was $35,000 in each case, he was in doubt whether the writs directed the receiver to turn over the gold dust. He testified that he told McKenzie that he (McKenzie) ought to comply with the writs, but as to what was necessary for him to do in order to comply therewith he did not undertake to advise him; that he thought when the appeals were taken the whole thing was taken out of his (Noyes's) hands, and that he was restrained from taking any further steps in the cases whatever, so far as the receiver was concerned. He admitted that he declined to make an order requiring the receiver to turn over the gold dust, "not believing I was bound to; on the contrary, believing it was not a part of my duty to do so."

On October 6, this gold dust remaining still in the possession of McKenzie, the receiver, but the mining claims involved in the suits having been surrendered by him to the defendants, who were then engaged in mining the same, Chipps, the plaintiff in the case of Chipps v. Lindeberg et al., by his counsel, applied to the court for an order upon the defendants therein, to show cause why they should not be restrained from removing from the territorial jurisdiction of the court the gold dust which they were then extracting from the mine, and accompanied the application with an affidavit setting forth the facts of the allowance of the appeal by Judge Morrow, and the issuance of the writ of supersedeas, which was therein referred to as "an alleged writ of supersedeas of the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit."

Hearing was had upon the order to show cause on October 8, at which time a discussion was had before the court, by counsel for the respective parties, concerning the effect of the writ of supersedeas. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that inasmuch as the appeal had been taken only from the receivership proceedings, and the main action remained pending before the court, there could be no violation of the writ of supersedeas by enjoining the defendants from deporting the gold dust from the jurisdiction. That argument was met by the defendant's counsel with the proposition that on proper application to the court and the proper bond being given, the court would have jurisdiction to issue an injunction, but that the court would have no jurisdiction unless the bond was offered, and they contended that the application for the injunction without the bond was merely a makeshift to avoid the writ of supersedeas.

On October 10 the court made the injunction order, enjoining the defendants from moving any of the gold dust from the jurisdiction of the court. It was made without bond and without suggestion of a bond. Judge Noyes testified that it was not his intention to order an injunction without a bond, and that if he so ordered in this instance it was by mistake. Marshal Vawter testified, and his testimony is not contradicted, that on October 10, the day when the injunctions were issued, and some three hours before their issuance, McKenzie came to him and was very anxious to have the injunctions served that night and wanted him to be ready to make the service.

On October 15 McKenzie was arrested at Nome upon an order of this court to show cause why he should not be held guilty of contempt for his disobedience to the writs of supersedeas. The defendants, on October 16, made a motion in court to dissolve the injunction of October 10. On the following day W. T. Hume, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, stated in open court that he thought it was the duty of the plaintiffs' attorneys in that matter and for their own good to dissolve the injunction of their own motion or for the court to dissolve it. Judge Noyes thereupon immediately said, "All of the injunction orders are dissolved forthwith."

The record and the evidence of these proceedings show from first to last upon the part of Judge Noyes an apparent disregard of the legal rights of the defendants in the cases in which McKenzie was appointed receiver. The proceedings upon which the receiver was appointed were extraordinary in the extreme. Immediately after his arrival at Nome in company with the man who it seems had gone to Nome for the express purpose of entering into the receivership business, and who boasted to others that he had secured the appointment of the judge, and that he controlled the court and its officers, upon papers which had not as yet been filed, before the issuance of summons and before the execution of receiver's bonds, without notice to the defendants, without affording them an opportunity to be heard, Judge Noyes wrested from them their mining claims, of which they were in the full possession, the sole value of which consisted of the gold dust which they contained and which lay safely stored in the ground, and placed the claims in the hands of a receiver with instructions to mine and operate the same, and this without any showing of an equitable nature to indicate the necessity or propriety of the receivership or the necessity for the operation of the mines by a receiver, in order to protect the property or to prevent its injury or waste.

When the defendants undertook to appeal from these orders, their right of appeal was denied them. The receiver so appointed was permitted to go on and mine these claims on an extensive scale and extract from them their value. According to the testimony some of the mines were "gutted." The appointment of the receiver was, in the case of Chipps v. Lindeberg, almost immediately followed by an order authorizing the receiver to take into his possession all the personal property of the defendants which was found upon the claim, including their stores, provisions, tools, and tents. The order so made was so arbitrary and so unwarranted in law as to baffle the mind in its effort to comprehend how it could have issued from a court of justice. That it was not inadvertent is shown by the fact that before making it Judge Noyes was reminded that the suit involved the placer mining claim only, and by the further fact that the order was preceded by the threat to "tie up" the defendants and take away their property, and was followed three weeks later by the deliberate execution of similar orders in the other four cases.

The appointment of the receiver in each case was in direct violation of the Code of Alaska, under which the court was organized (31 Stats., 451, sec. 753), which provides as follows: "A receiver may be appointed in any civil action or proceeding, other than an action for the recovery of specific personal property—first, provisionally, before judgment on the application of either party, when his right to the property which is the subject of the action or proceeding, and which is in the possession of an adverse party, is probable and the property or its rents or profits are in danger of being lost or materially injured or impaired." There is evidence of other arbitrary and oppressive action of the court in McKenzie's favor in cases in which he was receiver or was interested, notably the case of the Topkuk mine.

It is shown that two of the original locators of that mining property went to Judge Noyes upon his arrival at Nome and complained of the action of certain trespassers, and that he referred them to his private secretary, Wheeler, saying that the latter was about to resign his office and take up the practice of the law; that they went to Wheeler, and he proposed that if they would give him a one-half interest in the mine he would secure them the full possession of their property within twenty-four hours; that they refused this exorbitant demand, and after some discussion were about to engage his services in consideration of a one-eighth interest, when negotiations were dropped for the reason, it is suggested in the evidence, that McKenzie had become interested on the other side. An action of ejectment was then commenced by the persons whom the locators complained of, and one Cameron was immediately appointed by the court receiver of the mining property upon a bond of $10,000.

He proceeded to operate the mine upon an extensive scale, refused to use the machinery which the owners had placed there at an expense of $6,000, and instead rented machinery from McKenzie at the rate of $50 per day and bought supplies of him to the amount of $7,800. The owners attempted to protect their interests. They challenged the sufficiency of the bond and the ability of the sureties to respond, but without avail. They attempted to watch the clean-ups, but their right to be present was denied by the receiver. They applied to the court for relief, but the only relief they could obtain was an order that one of their number, who was designated by name, be permitted to be present at each clean-up simultaneously with one of the plaintiffs. The evidence is that a considerable portion of the time the plaintiffs declined to be present, and thereupon the receiver denied the right of the designated defendant to be present.

When the defendants finally established their title to the property by the verdict of a jury, and the receiver was discharged, his account showed that he had taken out of the mine $30,000, while his expenses were largely in excess of that amount. The owners contended that he had taken from the mine more than $200,000. Upon a reference of the receiver's account to a referee appointed by Judge Noyes it was found that the receiver had taken from the mine $100,000, and that his expenses were no more than $35,000. The evidence shows that neither the receiver nor his bondsmen have any property which can be found to apply upon this large deficit of $65,000. All these matters were properly shown to this court upon these proceedings, to throw light upon the transaction, to show the animus of Judge Noyes in those cases, and to aid the court to interpret the nature of his conduct in the matters upon which contempt is charged.

The charges are in substance that the respondent is guilty of contempt of this court in refusing to execute an order directing the receiver to obey the writs of supersedeas, in giving to the marshal and to Major Van Orsdale instructions to hold matters in statu quo and permit no one to have the gold dust, and in issuing the subsequent injunction of October 10 enjoining the defendants from removing the gold dust from the jurisdiction of the court. When the writs of supersedeas arrived at Nome and their contents were made known to Judge Noyes, and an application was made to him for an order requiring the receiver to obey them, it was his plain duty to make that order.

The receiver had refused to obey the writs. He was an officer of Judge Noyes's court, subject in all his conduct as receiver to be controlled by the order of that court, subject to removal or punishment for contempt in case of disobedience. If Judge Noyes believed the writs were void, it was none the less his duty to obey them and to leave the question of their validity to the decision of the court whose writs they were. He had no warrant for saying that his hands were tied. The writs of supersedeas did not tie his hands so as to prevent his obedience to their own terms. In language which was neither uncertain nor doubtful, they directed him to go no further with the receivership, and McKenzie to surrender all the property he had taken as receiver, including the gold dust.

It is absurd to say that Judge Noyes was enjoined from ordering McKenzie to do the very thing the writs commanded the latter to do. It was no excuse for denying the application for the order that the bonds upon which the appeals had been allowed were less in amount than the value of the gold dust which the receiver had taken out of the claims. The inadequacy of the bonds, if they were inadequate, was no concern of Judge Noyes. The appeals had been allowed, it is true, upon bonds aggregating $100,000, but that sum was considerably larger than the sum total of the bonds which Judge Noyes had required of McKenzie as receiver.

Had Noyes done nothing further than to refuse to make an order directing the receiver to obey the writs, however, we should hesitate to hold his refusal to be contempt of court. But he went further than that. Not only did he refuse to make the order, but, apparently fearful that the defendants in those cases were about to obtain possession of the gold dust under the writs, he issued to the marshal and to Major Van Orsdale directions to hold things in statu quo, and couched his directions in words, which, upon their face and unexplained, we can construe no other wise than as meaning that his purpose was to prevent the delivery of the gold dust to the defendants or to anyone.

These orders, it is true, were accompanied with the promise that the court would investigate the writs and issue such orders as might be proper for their enforcement, but when the promised orders were finally made they were orders not enjoining obedience, but the reverse. In framing the orders Judge Noyes took the language of the supersedeas so far as it enjoined him from further proceeding in the receivership matter and turned it into a general order of the court, which, if it had any force or effect at all, had the effect to inhibit the surrender of the gold dust by McKenzie, the receiver.

But Judge Noyes disclaimed that he had any purpose to interfere with the writs or to obstruct their enforcement and testified that his orders to the marshal and to Major Van Orsdale were made in consequence of the representations which the latter had made to him of the danger of violence, and were not directed against the delivery of the gold dust to the defendants, but were issued to preserve order and prevent riot and possible bloodshed. We have not disregarded the evidence which has been offered on behalf of Judge Noyes to explain the letters to the marshal and to Major Van Orsdale by reference to an alleged condition of lawlessness at Nome at that time, which threatened the safety of the property and the funds in the bank.

The evidence does not convince us that that state of things existed. On the contrary, the overwhelming weight of the evidence is that the only commotion that existed at that time was caused by the belief or the apprehension that the defendants in the suits, if balked by the refusal of the receiver to deliver the gold dust, would themselves take possession thereof. The evidence upon that point is to our minds so clear as to leave no room for doubt. We are convinced that Major Van Orsdale misunderstood the purport of the communication which he received from Judge Jackson. But inasmuch as Major Van Orsdale represented the situation to Judge Noyes as he has detailed it, we reckon with that fact and with the element of doubt which it might create were it not for the other evidence in the case.

All doubt is removed, however, when we come to consider the testimony of Marshal Vawter and Captain French concerning the oral directions which they received from Judge Noyes in connection with the "statu quo" letters. Vawter was instructed, as he testified, to prevent the defendants in those cases from obtaining the gold dust. Captain French, a disinterested witness, to whose testimony we must give full credit, testified that Judge Noyes directed him to issue no executive order in reference to the writs, which he understood to mean, and which could only mean, that Judge Noyes forbade him to issue an order that the gold dust referred to in the writs be turned over to the defendants in obedience to the commands of the writs. These oral instructions furnish evidence of the motive of the written instructions.

In giving them and in making the written instructions the respondent willfully committed an overt act which had the direct effect to interfere with the execution of the writs of this court, and thereupon the charge of contempt must be sustained. Concerning the remaining charges against the respondent it is not necessary to make extended comment. His action in issuing the writ of injunction of October 10 was attended by no features of contumacy or want of respect for this court, except the fact that it was made upon a petition which referred to the writs of supersedeas as "an alleged writ of supersedeas of the circuit court of appeals," and the fact that when the injunction was allowed it was allowed without bond. It is significant, perhaps, of the purpose which these injunctions were intended to serve that on October 17, after the arrival of the warrant of arrest of McKenzie, Judge Noyes of his own motion dissolved them.

In arriving at the conclusion which we have reached in this case we have not failed to recognize the seriousness of the charge of contempt when laid at the door of a judge of a court, nor the necessity of maintaining a due regard for the judicial discretion which belongs to that office. It is essential, however, to the administration of justice that the process of courts be obeyed. Upon no one does this obligation of obedience rest with more binding force than upon a judicial officer. The respondent, Arthur H. Noyes, is adjudged guilty of contempt of the authority of this court by his resistance to the execution of its writs of supersedeas. In view of the fact that he holds a public office, it is the opinion of the court that the respondent be required to pay a fine. It is accordingly adjudged that he pay a fine of $1,000.

Thomas J. Geary, an attorney of this court, was cited to show cause upon evidence which had been furnished by himself in his testimony taken before this court on January 23, 1901, in the case of Kjellman v. Rodgers upon the proceedings which were instituted against Alexander McKenzie for contempt. Mr. Geary testified at that time that he was the attorney for McKenzie, the receiver, at Nome, and that on or about September 17 he discussed with Judge Noyes the application which had been made to the latter for an order directing the receiver to turn over the gold dust according to the writs of supersedeas, in which discussion Judge Noyes said to him that he did not believe he possessed the authority to make such an order, and that the only order he could make was one staying proceedings, leaving the property where it was. The witness proceeded to say: "Under those circumstances I advised Mr. McKenzie not to turn over the money." In the cross-examination which was then had appears the following testimony:

Q. Was not your advice to McKenzie that the order was not appealable from, and for that reason he should not obey the writ of supersedeas?

A. That was part of it; not all of it. * * *

Q. Did you not advise him that the order of Judge Morrow allowing the appeal was void?

A. Yes, sir; I advised that because I thought that under the two cases that I have cited, that the order appointing McKenzie being merely an order appointing a receiver and not an injunction order, that Justice Morrow or this court had no jurisdiction of an appeal from the order appointing a receiver.

Q. Had you any intention of advising McKenzie on the 15th to turn over the gold dust?

A. I do not know how I can answer that any plainer than I have. I stated at that time that I advised Mr. McKenzie that evening after 6 o'clock that in my opinion the supersedeas did not require him to turn over the money.

Q. After that writ had been served upon him, McKenzie, did you advise him not to obey that writ?

A. Yes, sir. It did not change my opinion at all. If the original proceeding was void and the court had issued a writ it had not authority to issue, it was void.

In his testimony taken in the present proceedings, the respondent testified that he never at any time advised McKenzie to disobey the writs; that he went no further than to state to McKenzie his opinion of the law, and that he advised him that in his opinion not only the orders appointing him receiver were not appealable, but that the writs themselves did not require him to surrender the possession of the gold dust, and he testified that he gave McKenzie no advice whatever as to the course of action he ought to pursue in the matter. Upon his attention being directed to the specific testimony which he had given in the McKenzie case, and which is quoted above, he testified that either he did not catch the scope of the interrogatory, or that the testimony had been incorrectly taken by the reporter, and that he had not intended to testify as reported.

In that connection he directed attention to the fact that by the other questions and his answers thereto given in his former testimony it appeared that he did not advise McKenzie in regard to his action, or advise him to disobey the writs. There is no other evidence in the case sustaining the charge that the respondent advised the receiver to disregard the writs or to disobey the orders of this court. The testimony of Kenneth M. Jackson tends rather to some degree to corroborate the evidence of the respondent in that regard. We think that upon due consideration of the whole of the evidence against the respondent Geary there is not sufficient to convince us beyond a reasonable doubt that he has been guilty of contempt of the court. The charge against him will therefore be dismissed.

Joseph K. Wood, the United States district attorney, went to Nome in company with McKenzie and Judge Noyes and immediately after his arrival, through the intermediation of McKenzie, became a silent member of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, and appointed Mr. Hume his deputy district attorney. He corroborated the testimony of Hume to the effect that an arrangement was also made whereby McKenzie was to be a member of the firm and to receive one-fourth of the profits thereof, but he expressed a doubt whether the agreement was ever carried out. The charge which is made against Wood is that at the time of the arrest of McKenzie on October 15, 1900, the keys of the safe-deposit vaults in which McKenzie, as receiver, kept the gold dust, which was to be delivered under the writs of supersedeas, had been given by McKenzie to Wood, and that when the officers in the presence of McKenzie demanded of Wood the possession of the keys, he refused to surrender the same.

George H. Burnham, one of the deputy marshals who went from San Francisco to arrest McKenzie and enforce obedience to the writs of supersedeas, testified that on October 15, 1900, while he had McKenzie in his custody under arrest, he and Shelley Monckton, the other deputy marshal, demanded of McKenzie the keys of the box which contained the gold dust in the Alaska Banking and Savings Deposit Company, and that McKenzie answered that he had given the keys to Mr. Wood, the United States attorney; that Mr. Wood soon thereafter came into the room and Monckton said to him:

"Mr. Wood, we understand you have the keys of the boxes that contain the gold dust in the Alaska Banking and Savings Deposit Company, deposited there by Mr. McKenzie, the receiver," and that Mr. Wood said: "Do you understand I have the keys to those boxes? Understand nothing; I don't care what you understand," and that Mr. Monckton then said: "Well, Mr. Wood, Mr. McKenzie has just informed us that he gave you those keys; that you were an officer of the court; that he thought the keys were safer with you than with himself, and I now make demand on you for those keys," and that Mr. McKenzie then added: "Mr. Wood, I told the marshals you had the keys; that I thought they were safer with you than with myself," and then Mr. Monckton said: "I make demand on you for those keys. Have you the keys?" and that Wood replied: "I don't know whether I have them or not," and that he then got up and went to the door, and as he was going to the door he said, "I will see you later."

Dr. Cabell Whitehead, the manager of the bank, testified that when the deputy marshals came to the bank to obtain the gold dust he asked them if they had the keys and they replied denying that they had them, and that afterwards he met Wood on Stedman avenue and told him that the deputy marshals were at the bank and wanted to see him, to which Wood replied that "the sons of bitches knew where to find him if they wanted to see him;" that the witness protested against the use of that sort of language to him and told Wood he was simply trying to protect property, that he could not see any good purpose that could be served by breaking open those boxes, which the officers had a right to do and would do, and that Wood answered:

"I will deliver those keys to no one until I have seen a certain person;" that the witness then said to Wood that he did not think there was time to see anybody, because the marshals had been waiting some time and he did not think they would wait much longer, and that Wood turned and went across the street and said: "Let them proceed with their damned burglaries."

McKenzie testified that after he was arrested he handed Wood his pocketbook and keys and told him he wished him to take possession of them, as he was afraid they were going to take him to jail and he did not wish them to get possession of his private papers and private affairs, and that when the deputy marshals inquired of him if he had the keys he answered "no," and informed them that Mr. Wood had them, and that shortly after Wood passed through the room and Monckton asked him if he had the keys or requested him to give up the keys, and Wood said: "I will see about that later," and passed right on.

Mr. Wood never did surrender the keys, and the marshals were compelled to break open the boxes. In his answer upon the order to show cause the respondent states that his failure and refusal to give up the possession of the keys was not through a purpose on his part to hinder or obstruct the officers in discharging their duty or to render ineffectual any order of this court, or to be in contempt of court, but alleges that he was acting on the belief that he had not the authority or the right to surrender possession of the keys without instructions from McKenzie or against McKenzie's wishes as he understood them.

We think the evidence fully sustains the charges against the respondent, Wood, and indicates upon his part a hostile attitude toward the officers of this court, whose duty it was to enforce the writs of supersedeas, and a disposition to willfully obstruct them in the performance of their duty. We are disposed, however, in dealing with this case, to take into consideration the nature of the averments of his answer upon the order to show cause and the apology which he subsequently made to this court. It is the judgment of the court that the respondent, Joseph K. Wood, is guilty of contempt of the lawful orders of this court, and that he be imprisoned in the county jail of Alameda County, Cal., for a period of four months.

C. A. S. Frost, an attorney at law, was sent to Nome by the Department of Justice as a special examiner to advise and instruct the clerk of the court and the marshal concerning their duties and accounts. He held that office until September 15, 1900, when he resigned to become assistant district attorney to Joseph K. Wood, in the place of Hume, who had resigned, which office he held until April 15, 1901, when he became the private secretary of Judge Noyes. Direct testimony in support of the charges against Frost is given by Marshal Vawter, who testified that the relations between Judge Noyes, McKenzie, and Frost were intimate; that on September 15, 1900, Frost told him that the writs of supersedeas were void, and on that date dictated to him the following letter:

Hon. C. L. VAWTER,
United States Marshal, Nome, Alaska.

SIR: Your attention is invited to that portion of section No. 846, Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows:

"That where the ministerial officers of the United States have or shall incur extraordinary expenses in executing the laws thereof, the payment of which is not specifically provided for, the President of the United States has the authority to allow the payment thereof under special taxation of the district or circuit court of the district in which the said services have been or shall be rendered, to be paid from the appropriation for defraying extraordinary expenses of the judiciary."

If it shall be necessary for you to incur extraordinary expenses under this statute in suppressing specific unlawful acts, acts of violence or attempted violence, burglary, robbery, etc., you will be authorized to employ such force as may be necessary in the premises, and the necessary expenses thereof incurred by you may be included in an extraordinary expense account to be rendered and paid as provided in said action.

Respectfully, C. A. S. FROST.

The marshal testified that the letter was accompanied by an order to swear in a large posse comitatus to prevent the delivery of the gold dust to the Lane crowd or to the Pioneer people, and that Frost at the same time remarked that such delivery must be prevented at all hazards, and that he said: "They are going to try to take it by force, and these writs that have been sent up here will be declared void by the Supreme Court. You must obey this court; you are the executive officer of this court here." Frost in his testimony contradicted the marshal as to all essential features of his testimony, except that he admitted having written the letter, but the marshal is so well corroborated that we entertain no doubt of the truth of his testimony.

George Leekley, who was the marshal's deputy and clerk, and who occupied the same room with Frost, testified that a day or two after September 14, the date when the writs of supersedeas arrived at Nome, he had a conversation with Frost, in which the latter stated that it was the duty of the marshal by all means to preserve the gold dust intact in the bank in which it was then deposited, and prevent the defendants in said cases and the owners of the gold dust from securing the same under the writs. He also testified that Frost was the confidant and intimate friend and adviser of McKenzie and Judge Noyes, and spent a great deal of time in their company. There are other facts which are fully proven in the case, and which show the deep personal interest which Frost had in the McKenzie receivership, and his partisanship for McKenzie's cause in the controversies then pending.

It is proven that in August, 1900, Frost, in violation of his duties as an officer of the United States, and for the purpose of aiding McKenzie, employed on behalf of the United States, three detectives, Carson, Carroll, and McLean, who for such services during the latter part of August, all of September and a portion of October, were paid by the Department of Justice, two of them $10 per diem and their expenses, and one $15 per diem and his expenses, and that the purpose for which the detectives were employed, and the sole service which they rendered, was to watch the movements of the defendants and their attorneys in the cases in which McKenzie was receiver.

Frost admitted the employment of these men, but stated that they were engaged for the purpose of ferreting out certain efforts which he had heard were being made to corrupt the jury panel of the district court. The explanation which he gave is inherently improbable. He testified in substance that it came to his knowledge that attempts were being made to get persons on the jury panel, and that names were being furnished by interested parties to that end, and that it was for the purpose of ascertaining who was doing this and to prevent the corruption of the jury panel that the three detectives were employed.

He declined to state the nature of his information, claiming that it was a confidential communication. On cross-examination he testified that he gave the detectives no instructions to watch any particular person, but simply informed them that he had been informed that attempts were being made to corrupt the jury panel, and that he wanted them to find out who was doing that work. He testified that he received from them reports from time to time, but he declined to divulge the nature of their reports.

On further cross-examination it was shown from the witness that there were upwards of 300 names drawn from the grand and petit jury; that the names were selected one-half by the clerk of the court and one-half by the jury commissioner; that Frost made no inquiry of the clerk nor of the jury commissioner, and had no talk with either of them on the subject, and directed no investigation of either; that he gave to his detective no instructions whatever concerning either of these officers, and that he directed no investigation of the 300 names which were put in the box for jurors, and never personally saw that list or made any investigation of it. He admitted that these detectives were paid under the order of the judge out of funds in the hands of the clerk.

On further cross-examination he testified to a conversation which he had with Judge Noyes concerning lists of names that were presumably to be put into the jury box, and stated that Judge Noyes showed him the lists and an affidavit accompanying them, to the effect that certain persons had been furnishing names for the jury panel, and stated that Judge Noyes asked him if he knew of any way in which he could find out who the parties were who were attempting to corrupt the jury panel, and that he, Frost, had replied by saying that while he was in the Department of Justice the Attorney-General had authorized the employment of persons to investigate that sort of thing, and that he informed the Judge that if, in his opinion, it was necessary or advisable to employ some one for that purpose, he thought it might be done.

He further testified that Judge Noyes told him that the lists had been furnished by attorneys and that they were in the handwriting of two persons named. This testimony is not corroborated by Judge Noyes. He testified that he did not make any inquiry as to where the lists were obtained, and that he does not remember that anyone told him the lists had been furnished by attorneys, and that he could not have told anyone whose handwriting the names were in, and that he could not have shown Frost those lists earlier than August 25, because the affidavit which was attached thereto was dated August 25. There is positive and direct testimony of other witnesses concerning the purpose for which the detectives were employed.

John F. Mercer, who was a deputy marshal and who had been a captain in the First Montana Regiment in the Philippines, a man of standing and of good repute, so far as the evidence shows, testified that Frost told him that he wanted those detectives to watch Judge Johnson, Mr. Metson, Mr. Knight, Judge Jackson, Lane, their attorneys and following, and report to him their actions and doings. The witness testified that Frost stated to him that they were watching these people, and that Frost told him that they had the means of ascertaining what was going on in certain neighborhoods, notably the Judge's chambers. "I know," said the witness, "they were watching Mr. Metson's office; I know they were watching Judge Jackson very closely."

Mercer further testified that he saw these detectives giving their reports to Frost; that on one night one of them, Carson, reported that an attempt was to be made by the defendants in those suits to take certain gold dust out of the bank; that immediately after Frost conferred with the witness and told him what Carson had reported and said it must be prevented, and that he went out with Frost late that night to the bank and that Frost seemed very much excited and thought they ought to make a general alarm, and that this happened on the night of the arrival of the writs of supersedeas. Marshal Vawter testified that L. D. McLean, one of the detectives, told him that he was employed as a spy upon the attorneys and owners of those Anvil Creek claims of which McKenzie was receiver.

Dr. Cabell Whitehead, manager of the bank, testified that McKenzie came to him frequently and told him of reports which his detectives had made to him, and that on one occasion he referred to McLean as one of his detectives and reported a conversation which he said McLean had overheard through the wall of the room adjoining W. H. Metson's office. W. H. Metson testified that Carson was already employed by him before Frost engaged him as a detective, but that Frost was evidently not aware of that fact; that Carson came to him and reported to him that Frost had engaged him for the purpose of watching him (Metson), and had directed him to seek employment from Metson in order to be in a position to watch his movements and report the same to Frost.

That thereupon he (Metson) ostensibly and openly employed Carson, and from that time on Carson made regular reports to Frost, and that the reports were first submitted to Metson for his supervision. George A. Leekley testified also that on the night of the arrival of the writs of supersedeas Frost made several trips to the bank, and that Frost informed him that he had just received information that the defendants and owners of the gold dust were going to attempt to take the dust from the bank that night.

George V. Borchsenius, the clerk of the court, testified that he objected to the payment of the bills of these detectives for the reason that he did not think they were proper bills, but that Judge Noyes ordered him to pay them immediately, and said to him that he could either pay them or be in contempt of court. The amount of McLean's bill was about $900. The amount paid to the others is not stated. The whole of the evidence concerning the case of Frost convinces us beyond any reasonable doubt that he not only aided and abetted to the utmost of his power the efforts of McKenzie to obstruct the execution of the writs of supersedeas, but that, in his official capacity, he grossly betrayed the interests of the United States which were intrusted to his care.

The respondent, C. A. S. Frost, is adjudged to be in contempt of the lawful orders of this court, and for his contempt it is the judgment of the court that he be imprisoned in the county jail of Alameda County, Cal., for a period of twelve months.

CONCURRING OPINION OF ROSS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

The findings of fact in the cases of Arthur H. Noyes, Joseph K. Wood, and C. A. S. Frost, embodied in the foregoing opinion of my brother Gilbert, to the effect that each of those parties committed the contempt alleged against him, meets with my concurrence; but I am of the opinion that the records and evidence in the cases show beyond any reasonable doubt that the circumstances under which and the purposes for which each of those persons committed the contempt alleged and so found were far graver than is indicated in the opinion of the court, and that the punishment awarded by the court is wholly inadequate to the gravity of the offenses.

I think the records and evidence show very clearly that the contempt of Judge Noyes and Frost were committed in pursuance of a corrupt conspiracy with Alexander McKenzie and with others, not before the court and therefore not necessary to be named, by which the properties involved in the suits mentioned in the opinion, among other properties, were to be wrongfully taken, under the forms of law, from the possession of those engaged in mining them, and the proceeds thereof appropriated by the conspirators. For those shocking offenses it is apparent that no punishment that can be lawfully imposed in a contempt proceeding is adequate. But a reasonable imprisonment may be here imposed, and I am of the opinion that in the case of the respondent Arthur H. Noyes a judgment of imprisonment in a county jail for the period of eighteen months should be imposed, and in the case of Frost a like imprisonment of fifteen months.

The facts and circumstances against the respondent Wood are by no means strong, although I find it difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile his ignorance of and disconnection with the conspiracy with the facts that immediately upon his arrival at Nome he was, at McKenzie's dictation, given a one-fourth interest in the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume (which firm was employed to carry on the legal part of the nefarious business), and that Hume (who was, so far as appears, a total stranger to Wood) was, likewise at McKenzie's dictation, immediately appointed by Wood assistant United States attorney. I think Wood should be imprisoned for ten months.

In regard to the respondent Geary, I agree with the finding of the court to the effect that the contempt alleged against him is not sufficiently established. Reading and considering Geary's entire testimony, and especially his written opinion given McKenzie at the time of the occurrences in question, and in the light of the testimony of Mr. Metson, I am of the opinion that it is not shown that he went beyond the legitimate privileges of an attorney in giving his legal advice. I therefore concur in the dismissal of the proceedings against him.

In the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. In the matter of Arthur H. Noyes, in the matter of Thomas J. Geary, in the matter of Joseph K. Wood, in the matter of C. A. S. Frost. Concurring opinion of Morrow, circuit judge:

MORROW, circuit judge. I concur in the findings of fact contained in the opinion of Judge Gilbert in the cases of Arthur H. Noyes, Joseph K. Wood, and C. A. S. Frost. I am also of the opinion that the evidence does not establish the charge against Thomas J. Geary.

In my judgment the evidence establishes the fact that there was a conspiracy between the respondent Noyes, McKenzie, and others to secure possession of certain valuable mining claims at Nome, Alaska, under proceedings involving the appointment of a receiver, for the purpose of working the properties and obtaining the gold deposited in the claims. To carry these proceedings to a supposed successful conclusion, Noyes, McKenzie, and others found it a necessary part of their scheme to resist the process of this court. In pursuance of this conspiracy, the contempt charged against Noyes was committed; but I agree with Judge Gilbert that this conspiracy is outside the charge of contempt, and in view of the fact that the respondent Noyes holds a judicial position, I concur in his judgment that the respondent be required to pay a fine of $1,000.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I forgot to send to the desk the article from the New York Sun. I should like to have it go in the RECORD in full, taking it up at the part where I left off reading, and inserting the remainder of it as though I had read the whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none.

The remainder of the article referred to is as follows:

Page 33 of the record gives the following information:

Name, Benjamin Daniels; registered No., 95; when received, June 10, 1880; sentence, three and a half years; conduct while in confinement, conduct good; discharged, August 28, 1883, at the expiration of sentence. Allowed good time. Other items same as above.

That is the man who has been nominated and confirmed as United States marshal for Arizona, and Republicans here think that President Roosevelt, with whom Daniels served as a "Rough Rider," must have been ignorant as to his past.

When Daniels served his penitentiary sentence he lived for two or three years at Denver, employed by the most disreputable bunco men and gamblers, and was the leader of a "brace" game of faro. He afterwards took himself to La Junta, Colo., where he distinguished himself on one occasion by holding up a faro game with a gun and robbing it of $600, for which little stunt he was driven out of La Junta.

Daniels then moved on to Cripple Creek, alternately served on the police force and acted as stool pigeon for the crook gamblers of the place. It is understood that an effort will be made to have Daniels's commission withheld until his past record can be more fully ventilated, in the hope that a Republican can be found to serve as marshal of Arizona who is not a convicted felon.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, let us proceed with the little bill that has been before us.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make a few remarks in this connection.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator really think that the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, which involves so much, should be further delayed by this discussion?

Mr. STEWART. A little history, I think, is in order at this time.

Mr. HALE. Could not history wait? It generally does.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there is plenty of time.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator from Nevada, who is a good-natured man——

Mr. STEWART. Yes; always.

Mr. HALE. Let me go on and finish my little bill and then bring in his history?

Mr. STEWART. It is a very interesting history.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt it is.

Mr. STEWART. I think it ought to be known in this connection. I am going to put it in the RECORD. I think this matter in Nome commenced a little earlier than has been stated.

Mr. HALE. I can not stop the Senator, of course.

Mr. STEWART. No; not well. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no interest in Nome, directly or indirectly, never have had, and never was consulted as an attorney in regard to any matters there. My attention was first called to matters in Nome by an amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] to the Alaskan code when it was pending here in the spring of 1900. That amendment was retroactive and calculated to take away the property of a large number of people by changing the title to the property. I knew nothing about the circumstances when the amendment was offered, but I was very much opposed to it when I saw its purpose. The amendment was in these words:

SEC. 73. That persons who are not citizens of the United States, or who, prior to making location, had not legally declared their intention to become such, shall not be permitted to locate, hold, or convey mining claims in said district of Alaska, nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal. In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working or operation of a mining claim, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator: Provided, That no location of a mining claim shall hereafter be made in the district of Alaska by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact, and all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

That changed the law. The law as it stood allowed any person to locate; it said that the mineral lands of the United States should be open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States or those who had declared their intention to become such. Foreigners who had been prospecting in the country frequently located and when the question of their title came before the courts and then before the Supreme Court the Supreme Court held that they had rights that could only be defeated by the Government itself; that a third party could not destroy their rights; that they themselves might, even if the question was raised by the Government, declare their intention to become citizens. It appeared in that discussion that large numbers of Laplanders and others in Alaska had declared their intention to become citizens and others had not. They had gone to that region and had located mining claims. They had been dispossessed, and the subject was discussed here for nearly a month. The Senate, after full discussion, voted against this retroactive law and held to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—I need not recite those decisions—that a party who had located on mineral land might hold until the Government intervened. This change in the condition of a great mining region like that attracted my attention. When the proposition was defeated, I supposed that was the end of it.

Then commenced another history, and I have extracts from that history. Judge Noyes was appointed on the 6th of June, 1900, and proceeded to Alaska. I have in my hand a synopsis of the record which he has made, and quotations from the record. I will ask the Secretary to read the synopsis of the record made by Judge Noyes; and if anyone desires to make any criticism of it, I have copies of the record and the references to show what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Memorandum of facts taken from the records and sworn testimony in various cases, calling for the immediate removal of Judge Noyes on account of his manifest dishonesty or incompetency.

[Filed with the Attorney-General March 2, 1901.]

In the spring of 1900 Judge Noyes was appointed judge, and in July proceeded to Alaska, the court over which he was to preside being stationed at St. Michael, a short distance from Nome. On his way across the continent to the scene of his judicial labors he was accompanied by Alexander McKenzie, a man whom he had known for twenty years, having resided with him for a long period of time in the State of North Dakota. On taking the steamer for Cape Nome, McKenzie and Judge Noyes were joined, among others, by Robert Chipps, a man who in the preceding year had located a claim near Nome, which claim had been located prior to that time by others, Chipps being really a "jumper."

Chipps had spent a considerable portion of the preceding winter in New York City and Washington, D. C., meeting McKenzie and others, including Judge Noyes, in Washington. He had been told then that Judge Noyes was a candidate for a judgeship, and that he was regarded by McKenzie as a good man. Chipps had, while in New York, made a deed of a claim he had jumped to Alexander McKenzie, who held it for the Alaska Gold Mining Company, and he received in exchange for this deed a considerable sum of money and the promise of $300,000 in stock of the company.

On the steamship going to Nome Chipps discussed with Judge Noyes his claim as a jumper and the fact that he was about to commence litigation, and Judge Noyes told him that he supposed he would want a receiver appointed. It was his understanding, derived from his conversation with McKenzie, that they would have "a shade the best of it" in any lawsuit likely to be brought before Judge Noyes.

The party reached Nome on Saturday, July 21, and at 5 o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, July 23, there were filed before Judge Noyes half a dozen applications for receivers, representing claims to as many of the richest mines in that neighborhood.

Careful inspection of the bills of complaint in the various cases in which receivers were asked for will show that the original intention of the complainants was to apply merely for injunctive relief, for after setting up the names of the parties, alleged discovery and location, entry, filing of notice of location with the office of the recorder, ouster by the defendants, and work upon the premises by them in a reckless way; that the premises are particularly valuable for gold; that the defendants are insolvent and irresponsible, and the gold is being secreted, the bills continue by declaring that unless the defendants, etc., be restrained, etc., the claim will be wholly lost to the complainant and destroyed for mining purposes, following the foregoing by an excuse for not sooner presenting a bill of complaint and reciting the bringing of an action at law. They then say that in order to preserve the rights of the complainants, etc., it is necessary, proper, and convenient that a receiver be appointed, etc.

It will be seen from the foregoing summary that not a single statement is made in the bill of complaint justifying the appointment of a receiver for a placer-mining claim, and that the paragraph asking for such receiver is an interpolation and in no way related to the substance of the bill. That this is a fact further appears by the circumstances shown in the accompanying documents, that Judge Noyes from the bench declared that the idea of a receiver was his own suggestion.

In the granting of injunctions in the various causes, which injunctions were granted at the same time that receivers were appointed, Judge Noyes violated the civil government law of Alaska, which provides (sec. 384, p. 397, session statutes, first session Fifty-sixth Congress) that "Before allowing" an injunction "the court or judge shall require of the plaintiff an undertaking, with one or more sureties, to the effect that he will pay all costs and disbursements that may be decreed to the defendant, and such damages, not exceeding an amount therein specified, as he may sustain by reason of the injunction if the same be wrongful or without sufficient cause."

Judge Noyes again clearly violated the well-established principles of law in that the receivers named on July 23, 1900, were appointed ex parte. No suggestions are made in the bills of complaint justifying or excusing the appointment of ex parte receivers. No such emergency is stated as would excuse the appointment of a receiver without notice, nor is any difficulty alleged in the way of serving process or rule to show cause. The simple fact is that without excuse or justification Judge Noyes on July 23 transferred to the possession of Alexander McKenzie, his old friend and companion on the ship, six of the richest mining claims in Alaska, worth together hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars.

The fact that in at least two cases the record shows that the receiver went into possession on the very day of his appointment, the parties theretofore in possession being on that day served with process, indicates that no reason existed why a rule to show cause might not well have issued before the making of an appointment.

The bond required of the receiver in each case bore no relation to the value of the property coming into his hands.

Chipps v. Lindeberg: Amount of gold theretofore extracted, $200,000; being taken out daily, $15,000; bond, $5,000.

Rogers v. Kjellman: Gold theretofore extracted, $10,000; being taken out daily, $500; bond, $5,000.

Webster v. Nakkela: Gold theretofore extracted, $50,000; being taken out daily, $500; bond, $5,000.

Melsing v. Tornansis: Gold theretofore extracted, $150,000; being taken out daily, $5,000; bond, $5,000.

Although the suggestion in the bills of complaint that the mines were being unskillfully and wastefully worked was manifestly inserted merely for the purpose of securing injunctive relief, nevertheless, if these paragraphs were so inserted as a guide to the court in the selection of a receiver, they evidently failed of their purpose, for the court appointed Alexander McKenzie, a man who, so far as the records at any point disclose, was wholly without mining experience.

Judge Noyes was guilty of another act of high-handed usurpation, in that in a large number of cases, without any prayer therefor in the bill of complaint, and without any petition or affidavits filed to justify the passing of any order, and in the very teeth of the provisions of the special code of Alaska limiting the appointment of a receiver to special actions of receivers "other than an action for the recovery of specific personal property," he directed the receiver to take possession of "tents, buildings, safes, scales, and all personal property, fixed and movable, gold, gold dust, and precious metals, money, and books of all kinds, and each and all personal property upon such claim, connected therewith, or in any way appertaining thereto, in possession of or under the control of the defendants." By virtue of this order thousands of dollars of property clearly belonging to the parties upon the claim, including gold dust in many instances obtained by working other claims, was seized and held by the receiver, and even the very beds upon which the men slept were taken from them.

Notwithstanding the manifest impropriety of the appointment of receivers under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, motions to set aside the orders appointing them were all denied. When an appeal was sought from his arbitrary orders, Judge Noyes refused to permit it, and so determined was he to prevent these causes from getting beyond his reach that in the order denying the appeal he said:

"Now, therefore, it is by the said judge ordered that the said proposed bill of exceptions is in each and every part thereof disallowed as a bill of exceptions herein, and the settlement thereof or of any proposed bill of exceptions herein is hereby refused; that said petition for an order allowing said appeal is hereby denied, and said judge declines to accept or fix the amount of any bond for costs thereof, or to allow a supersedeas bond to be given, or to fix the amount thereof."

Recognizing the gross wrongs committed by Judge Noyes, Judge W. W. Morrow, of the United States court of appeals, on August 27 directed an appeal to be granted and that a writ of supersedeas issue. By the terms of this writ Alexander McKenzie and Judge Noyes, together with the respective plaintiffs, were commanded "that from every and all proceedings on any execution of the aforesaid order or in any wise molesting the said defendants on the account aforesaid, or in any manner interfering with their possession of said property, you entirely surcease and refrain, as being superseded, and that you, the said Alexander McKenzie, do forthwith return unto said defendants the possession of any and all property of which you took possession under and by virtue of said order, * * * and you, the judge of said district court for the district of Alaska, second division, are hereby commanded to stay any and all proceedings which may have issued, as aforesaid, upon said order, and to stay any and all further proceedings in relation to the said order, and the appointment of a receiver thereunder in this case pending the appeal last aforesaid in this court."

This writ was served on Judge Noyes at 2 o'clock p. m., September 14, and although he was immediately thereafter asked to direct the receiver to return the property taken by him to the defendants, he in all cases refused to pass such order, and simply passed an order staying proceedings. Because of the default of McKenzie in obeying the supersedeas he has in two cases been sentenced to jail for six months. His excuse for disobedience was that he had not been directed by Judge Noyes to comply with the supersedeas. If McKenzie were in default, what shall we say of the position of Judge Noyes?

THE TOPKUK CASE.

One of the richest mines in Alaska was known as the Topkuk mine, and at the time of the arrival of Judge Noyes was in the peaceable possession of the Black Chief Mining Company. Immediately after his arrival suit was brought in ejectment by jumpers and a suit in equity filed for the appointment of a receiver. In this case the usual course was departed from and the rule to show cause issued. Upon the return of the rule, notwithstanding the strongest possible affidavits on the part of the defense, a receiver was appointed, and although in the case of substantially every other rich mine which had been thrown into litigation McKenzie had been appointed receiver, a man named Cameron, hailing also from North Dakota, and a friend of McKenzie, was named, and a man named McCormack employed by him as superintendent of the mine. To understand the reason why Cameron rather than McKenzie was appointed, a brief digression must be permitted.

McKenzie had taken with him to Nome, in boxes bearing his name, a large quantity of machinery supposed to belong to the Alaska Gold Mining Company, and the cost of which at Nome, freight included, was something under $20,000. He had used it unavailingly in connection with some beach mining, and finding the machinery practically valueless, desired to discover a purchaser. A day or two prior to the appointment of Cameron as receiver at Topkuk, McKenzie loaded it on barges bound for that neighborhood and directed it to be sent there. At about the same time he held a meeting in Alaska of the directors of the Alaska Gold Mining Company, at which a resolution was passed authorizing the sale of the machinery.

One of the directors present was McCormack, afterwards manager of the Topkuk mine. The machinery was sold to Cameron as receiver for the sum of $29,000, and although the Topkuk mine was supplied with all the machinery needed, such machinery was displaced and the discarded machinery belonging to McKenzie—or, in other words, to the Alaska Gold Mining Company—was installed in its place. Of course, a sale of this machinery by McKenzie to McKenzie, receiver, would have been too obvious, but a sale by McKenzie, receiver, to Cameron (Cameron being, as is evident by a consideration of the record, his alter ego) was permissible, and the fact that McCormack, his manager, was one of the directors of the Alaska Gold Mining Company was, of course, readily lost sight of.

JUDGE NOYES'S PRIVATE SECRETARY, A. K. WHEELER.

Judge Noyes, by an order dated June 30, 1900, but entered of record long after that date, appointed A. K. Wheeler as his private secretary, and as such he was paid for the months of July, August, and September at the rate of $250 per month, and his board bills were also allowed as proper expenditures during the same period by Judge Noyes. During all this time Wheeler was a practitioner before Judge Noyes, appearing in a number of cases enumerated in the extracts hereto attached, and in several cases, as is shown by the accounts of the clerk, receiving refund of costs.

On one occasion Judge Noyes suggested to the persons interested in the Black Chief Mining Company that Wheeler, his private secretary, would be a good man for them to employ, and they found his office to be directly adjoining that of the judge, and when they went there to consult with him he was going in and out between the two offices and evidently consulting with his superior officer. This apparent consultation took place while a suggested fee was being considered, one-eighth to three-tenths of the mine being discussed as the proper amount to be paid for getting the company out of its difficulties. The impropriety of the private secretary of the judge practicing before him and receiving fees, especially contingent ones, as a practitioner, while being paid for his services as a Government official, occupying confidential relations with the judicial authority, is too patent to call for extended comment.

CONCLUSION.

Summing up the foregoing, the spectacle is presented of the judge seizing, in violation of statute and common law, and in violation of all precedent, property belonging to private individuals and transferring it to the possession of an old friend. It is found that when this old friend himself can not with safety act as receiver a complacent judge names another man to serve his temporary purposes. It is discovered that the judge permitted his private secretary to practice before him and at the same time to be paid as a public official and as an attorney for litigants, himself approving his governmental accounts.

In view of all the foregoing it is submitted that, either because of dishonesty or absolute and proven incompetency and reckless disregard of the rights of private individuals, Judge Noyes is unfit to act in any judicial capacity, and should be summarily removed. Condemned as he is by the record he has himself made, the authenticity of which can not be questioned, it is believed that the citizens of Alaska should not be further prejudiced by the continuance in office of Judge Noyes for even an additional day.

In the foregoing statements reliance has been placed upon the transcripts in the several cases which have gone to the United States circuit court of appeals; upon the record in the contempt cases against Alexander McKenzie; upon the opinion of the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit in the McKenzie contempt case; upon Senate Document No. 196, second session Fifty-sixth Congress; and, as a matter of convenience, there is herewith filed "The Case of Judge Arthur H. Noyes, of Nome, Alaska," a pamphlet reviewing many of the circumstances herein set forth, and also extracts from the contempt proceedings, which extracts have particular relation to this memorandum of facts.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to have published in this connection the proceedings of the circuit court of appeals in the contempt case against McKenzie.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection on the part of the Senate to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The document referred to is as follows:

Nos. 634 and 636. In the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. John I. Tornanses, appellant, v. L. F. Melsing et al. and William A. Kjellman, appellant, v. Henry Rogers. In the matter of the contempt of Alexander McKenzie in having disobeyed and refused to comply with the terms of the writs of supersedeas duly issued herein. Opinion and judgment.

Page, McCutchen, Harding, and Knight, for appellants.
Thomas J. Geary and A. C. Severance, for respondent, Alexander McKenzie.
Before Gilbert, Ross, and Morrow, circuit judges.
Ross, circuit judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The proceedings now before the court in the above-entitled cases grow out of the alleged disobedience by one Alexander McKenzie of certain writs of supersedeas issued out of this court upon the order of Hon. William W. Morrow, one of its judges. They have been argued and submitted together and will be so considered.

Each case originated in the United States district court for the second division of the district of Alaska, of which Arthur H. Noyes is the judge, George V. Borchsenius the clerk, and C. E. Dickey a deputy clerk. Placer mining claim, known as No. 10 Above Discovery, on Anvil Creek, a tributary to Snake River, was the subject of controversy in the action of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses, and placer mining claim No. 2 Below Discovery, on the same creek, was the subject of contention in the action of Rogers v. Kjellman. Both claims are situated within the Cape Nome mining district of Alaska.

The act of Congress under which Judge Noyes was appointed was approved June 6, 1900. (31 Stat. L., 321.) In its fourth section it is provided that:

"The judge designated to preside over division No. 2 (within which division is the Cape Nome mining district) shall reside at St. Michaels during his term of office, and shall hold at least one term of court each year at St. Michaels, in the district, beginning the third Monday in June."

It is further provided in the fourth section that each of the three judges provided for by the act "is authorized and directed to hold such special terms of court as may be necessary for the public welfare or for the dispatch of the business of the court, at such times and places in the district as they or any of them, respectively, may deem expedient, or as the attorney-general may direct;" and that "at least thirty days' notice shall be given by the judge or the clerk of the time and place of holding special terms of the court."

It is not pretended that Judge Noyes held any term of the court at St. Michaels in June, or that any notice was given by him or the clerk of the court of the holding of a special term thereof at Nome or elsewhere, prior to the acts out of which the present proceedings arise. On the contrary, it appears from the records and proofs on file in this court that the steamer on which Judge Noyes went from the city of Seattle, Wash., to Alaska did not reach the roadstead of Nome until July 19, 1900, and that he did not go ashore until Saturday, July 21. Two days thereafter, to wit, Monday, July 23, he signed orders appointing Alexander McKenzie receiver of said placer-mining claims, with directions to take immediate possession thereof and to manage, mine, and work the same; to preserve the gold, gold dust, and proceeds resulting from the working and mining of the claims, and to dispose of the same subject to the further orders of the court; and further ordering the persons then in possession of the claims to deliver to the receiver their immediate possession, control, and management, and expressly enjoining them from in any manner interfering with the mining or working of the claims by the receiver, or with his control or management thereof. The amount of the bond required by the judge of the receiver was $5,000 in each case.

These orders were signed at the same time, and the circumstances under which they were made appear in the proceedings of the court of August 3, 1900, on the motion of counsel for the parties against whom they were directed, made for their annulment on July 24. We extract from the record in the case of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses—precisely similar proceedings appearing also in the case of Rogers v. Kjellman:

"Upon the hearing of the applications to set aside appointments of receiver in the Anvil Creek cases, Mr. Knight, of counsel for defendant, after reading affidavits in support of his application, continued as follows:

"In addition, if the court please, to these affidavits, we desire to introduce the records of the court in this case; and if Mr. Dickey is here I desire to call him as a witness.

"The COURT. I believe Mr. Dickey is inside.

"Mr. KNIGHT. I desire to call Mr. Dickey with reference to the filing of these papers."

(It is ascertained that Mr. Dickey is not in.)

"The COURT. The records are here; can you use them instead?

"Mr. KNIGHT. I desire to prove, if the court please, that the papers were not filed in this case until after an order had been made appointing a receiver; and further, that no process was issued at that time, or summons, and that, so far as I know, it has not been issued at the present time.

"Mr. HUME. So far as the plaintiff is concerned, the papers were delivered to the clerk to be filed, all at the same time.

"Mr. KNIGHT. The summons has not been served on any of our people.

"Mr. HUME. So far as I know, the summons has not been served in any of these cases. Preparation was made to serve the summons, but the defendants came into court the next morning, and the question of the propriety of their appearance here before answer coming up, personal service has been delayed until the court should pass upon that matter. We have been getting the papers ready to serve each and every person interested with a copy of the complaint.

"Mr. KNIGHT. I wish simply to make the point that the papers were not filed before the order was issued.

"The COURT. All the papers were before the court; they were left here.

"Mr. KNIGHT. But my point is, that they were not filed until after the order appointing the receiver was made, and that the order was made before process issued. I think your honor will agree as to the fact that the bill of complaint was presented to your honor on the afternoon of the 23d day of July, 1900, and that your honor thereafter made an order appointing a receiver, and the papers were subsequently that evening handed to the deputy clerk of the court for filing, but that no process was issued in the cases in which I now appear—that is, in the cases involving No. 2 Below, Nos. 10 and 11 Above, and No. 1 Nakkela. Mr. Hume, is that correct?

"Mr. HUME. Well, of course, as to the time they were filed, we can agree to this fact—that all the papers, the affidavits and bills of complaint and summons, were all presented here to the court. They were not presented to the for portions of the Proceedings here omitted.

clerk. We couldn't find the clerk at that time; he had no office. They were presented to the court and left with the court. All the papers were left with the court, and the clerk was to file them; but, he being out some place, we were unable to find him, and he having no special office, we presumed they were not filed until later. Everything was in confusion then, and we simply left the papers with the court; that is all we could do.

"The COURT. I remember this—that the papers were here on the table, and I called Mr. Dickey's attention to them.

"Mr. KNIGHT. After the order had been made?

"The COURT. Oh, yes.

"Mr. KNIGHT. It is agreed, further, then, that no process has yet issued in this case?

"Mr. HUME. I think the summons has been issued. I know it was made out.

"Mr. KNIGHT. But no process has been placed in the hands of an officer for service?

"Mr. HUME. No; I think not. I think not placed in the hands of an officer.

"The COURT. I think you will find, as a matter of record, that the summons has been issued.

"Mr. KNIGHT. As far as the issuance of process is concerned, the records will speak for themselves."

It thus appears that the injunctions and orders appointing a receiver of the claims in question were made before the organization of the court, without notice of any character, and before any paper of any kind had been placed on the files of the court—assuming the court to have been organized and in condition for the transaction of business. Not only so, but the injunction granted and the appointment of the receiver in the case of Rogers v. Kjellman was based upon a pleading which is without a single allegation of an equitable nature.

That pleading alleges only the citizenship of the plaintiff Rogers and the alienage of the defendant Kjellman; the competency of the plaintiff to make locations under the mining laws of the United States; his discovery of gold on and his location of claim No. 2 Below Discovery, on Anvil Creek, on the 6th day of June, 1899; his marking of its boundaries in accordance with the statutes of the United States and with the local rules of the mining district within which it is situated, and the recordation of notice of the location in the office of the recorder of the district; the possession of the claim by the plaintiff until his dispossession by the defendant on or about July 1, 1899; the withholding thereof by the defendant ever since, and the extraction therefrom by the defendant and others under him of $100,000 in gold and gold dust, to the damage of the plaintiff in that sum and the right of the plaintiff to a restitution of the possession of the claim.

The prayer is only for such restitution of possession of the property and for $100,000 damages, and for costs. In other words, the complaint in the case of Rogers v. Kjellman, upon which the judge granted an injunction and appointed a receiver, was an ordinary complaint in ejectment, without a single allegation of even an equitable nature. It is true there was presented to the judge at the same time the affidavit of the plaintiff Rogers and the affidavit of one Charles Cooper, in which they swore, in substance, that the defendant Kjellman was not a citizen of the United States and had never declared his intention to become such; had never located or marked the claim in question in accordance with law, but had extracted therefrom during the mining season of 1899 gold to the amount of $100,000 and removed the same beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and that his servants and assigns were then in the possession of and working the claim, whose only value consisted of the gold it contained, and, if allowed, would continue to work the claim and extract therefrom $5,000 a day and appropriate the same to their own use, in fraud of the plaintiff's rights.

In the case of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses, the order granting the injunction and appointing the receiver was based upon an unverified bill praying for an injunction and an order appointing a receiver, supported by the affidavits of one T. H. Downing and one E. W. Bacon. L. F. Melsing, H. L. Blake, D. B. Libby, W. T. Hume, and O. P. Hubbard are the complainants in that bill and John I. Tornanses is the sole defendant thereto, although it appears in more than one place in its body that the complainants contemplated naming other parties also as defendants.

In the bill it is, among other things, alleged "that the complainant, L. F. Melsing, has begun an action at law against the defendants herein to recover the possession of the premises herein described, a copy of which complaint is attached to this bill and made a part hereof; that in order to preserve the rights of the complainant in said action at law and in said placer mining claim pending the termination of said action at law, to prevent the extraction of gold from said claim and the appropriation thereof by defendants, his lessees, agents, servants, employees, and grantees, and preserve the said property and the gold extracted therefrom, it is necessary, proper, and convenient that a receiver should be appointed by this honorable court to take possession of, charge of, and care for said claim, and to hold, operate, and mine and control the same, under the orders of this honorable court, until the termination of said action at law; that the complainants, H. L. Blake, D. B. Libby, O. P. Hubbard, and W. T. Hume, are grantees, for a valuable consideration, of the said complainant, L. F. Melsing, of an undivided interest each in said placer mining claim, and are the owners of a substantial and undivided interest in the land and premises hereinbefore described, alleged, and designated as said placer mining claim No. 10 Above Discovery, on Anvil Creek."

The record shows that the complaint in the action at law thus spoken of was verified by Melsing on the 25th day of August, 1899, and is entitled in the district court of the United States for the district of Alaska, which court was abolished by the act of Congress of June 6, 1900. (31 Stat. L., 321.) That complaint, however, appears from the record to have been filed in the district court for the district of Alaska, second division, created by the last-mentioned act of Congress, at the time the bill in the case of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses was filed therein, together with an affidavit of Melsing, made by him on the 25th day of August, 1899, evidently to be used in some way in connection with the action at law entitled in the abolished court.

The bill in the case of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses further alleges that on the 11th day of March, 1899, Melsing discovered gold in the ground known as the said placer mining claim No. 10 Above Discovery, and, being at the time competent to do so, located the ground under the mining laws of the United States, marking the boundaries thereof in accordance with law, and recording the notice of the location in the office of the recorder of the district in which the claim is situated, and took peaceable possession thereof; that thereafter and on or about May 1, 1899, the defendant Tornanses wrongfully and forcibly, by himself and others under him, ejected Melsing from the premises and took possession of the claim, and has ever since withheld its possession from him; that during the mining season of 1899 the defendant worked the said claim and extracted therefrom gold of the value of at least $150,000, and at the opening of the season of 1900 commenced, and still continues the working of the claim, thereby extracting therefrom each day gold and gold dust of the value of at least $5,000, all of which the defendant, Tornanses, his lessees and grantees, have appropriated to their own use and benefit, to the injury of the complainants and in fraud of their rights; that the ground is valuable only for the gold it contains, and that the defendant, Tornanses, his agents, lessees, and grantees are insolvent, and that the defendant Tornanses is an alien and has never declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

This bill, as has been said, was never verified. The affidavits of Downing and Bacon, presented in support of the bill, are only to the effect that in July, 1900 (that of Bacon fixing the date as the 19th of that month), they saw working upon claim No. 10 Above Discovery a large number of men, under, as they were informed and believe, the defendant or his assigns or grantees, and that the claim was being unskillfully worked, with the object of taking only the richest pay dirt, without regard to the manner in which the claim would be left thereafter, and that the continuation of such work in that manner would destroy the value of the claim. The affidavit of Bacon further states that he was informed by the men at work that they were getting gold therefrom at the rate of a dollar a shovel, and that in addition to the work by hand the persons working the ground had a steam plant in operation thereon for the purpose of expediting the extraction of the gold contained therein, and that the pay dirt was then so exposed as to be easily sluiced and worked when there should be sufficient water in Anvil Creek, and that when there should be more water in the creek the parties then working the ground "could take thousands of dollars out of said claim, and virtually destroy the same for sale or proper operation, unless restrained by order of the court."

It was upon the showing here stated and under the circumstances above detailed that Judge Noyes, on the 23d day of July, 1900, signed the orders granting the injunctions and appointing the receiver of the mining claims in question, who at once took possession of them. On the 24th day of July, 1900, in the case of Melsing et al. v. Tornanses, and on the 30th day of July, 1900, in the case of Rogers vs. Kjellman, the parties claiming under Tornanses and Kjellman moved the court to vacate those orders, supporting the motions by the notices of location of the respective claims by Tornanses and Kjellman, by their respective deeds of conveyance, and by numerous affidavits. The notice of location by Kjellman of claim No. 2 Below Discovery described the claim, set forth the discovery of gold thereon on the 22d day of September, 1898, and its location on that day, and appears to have been witnessed by John Brynteson and Erik O. Lindblom, and was filed for record at 12 o'clock noon on October 12, 1898, with A. N. Kittelsen, recorder of the mining district.

The notice of location by Tornanses of claim No. 10 Above Discovery, was similar, and purported to have been witnessed by G. W. Price and A. N. Kittilsen, M. D., and filed for record at 12 o'clock noon on October 18, 1898. The deeds thus presented to the court were conveyances from those original locators, for a valuable consideration, to Charles D. Lane of their interests in the claims. The affidavits presented in support of the motions to vacate the orders referred to set forth, among other things, that Tornanses was the first locator of the aforesaid claim No. 10 Above Discovery, and that Kjellman was the first locator of the aforesaid claim No. 2 Below Discovery; that prior to the respective locations gold was discovered by the locator in the ground located, and that in making each of said locations the boundaries thereof were so marked upon the ground that they could be readily traced, and that from the time of their location each of the claims was in the possession of the locator and his successors in interest, and during each working season thereafter was mined for gold in a proper miner-like way; that the conveyance of those claims to Lane was made to him for and on behalf of the Wild Goose Mining and Trading Company, a corporation—that of the aforesaid claim No. 2 Below Discovery, on the 9th day of September, 1899, and that of the aforesaid claim No. 10 Above Discovery, on the 18th day of September, 1899, since which time neither Kjellman nor Tornanses have ever had possession of, or control over, either of said claims, but that both of them thereupon departed from the United States, and neither has ever returned, and that the property has since been held and worked by Lane and those holding under him, and was so worked and held at the time of the initiation of these cases. The affidavits on behalf of the moving parties also deny the alleged insolvency of Lane and those holding under him, and, on the contrary, aver that both Lane and the Wild Goose Mining and Trading Company are amply able to respond in any damages that may be recovered against them.

In each case the district court, on the 10th day of August, 1900, made and entered an order denying the motion so made to vacate the order granting the injunction and appointing the receiver, and on the 14th day of August, 1900, counsel for the defendants in each case petitioned the court for an order allowing an appeal from the order granting the injunction and appointing the receiver, at the time presenting to the court a proper bond on appeal, together with an assignment of errors and a proposed bill of exceptions for settlement and allowance; in response to which the judge, on the 15th day of August, 1900, made an order in each case "that said proposed bill of exceptions is in each and every part thereof disallowed as a bill of exceptions herein, and the settlement thereof, or of any proposed bill of exceptions herein, is hereby refused; that said petition for an order allowing said appeal is hereby denied, and said judge declines to accept or fix the amount of any bond for costs thereof, or allow a supersedeas bond to be given or fix the amount thereof."

Dated Nome, Alaska, August 15, 1900.

ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge.

On the same day, to wit, August 15, 1900, the judge made and entered the following order in each case:

"Now, at this time, comes the plaintiff by his attorneys, Hubbard, Beeman & Hume and Dudley Du Bose, and moves the court for an additional and further order in the matter of the appointment of Alexander McKenzie as receiver in the above-entitled suit, and the court being fully advised in the premises:

"It is further ordered that, in addition to the powers and authorities already granted the receiver appointed, the said receiver is hereby ordered to take possession of the placer claim mentioned in the complaint herein, and all sluice boxes, dams, excavations, machinery, pipe, boarding houses, tents, buildings, safes, scales, and all other personal property, fixed or movable, on the said placer claim; also all gold, gold dust, precious metals, money, books of account, and each and all personal property upon the said claim connected therewith, and in any way appertaining thereto, in possession of and under the control of the defendant, his lessees, grantees, assigns, employees; and all and every person in possession of the said claim or claiming any right, title, or interest in and to the said placer claim, or any gold dust therein or any personal property thereon of any nature whatsoever, are hereby ordered to deliver the same to the said receiver, and are hereby restrained from interfering with the said receiver in quiet and peaceable possession of the same, or any agent that the said receiver may designate to take possession thereof.

"It is further ordered that this order shall revoke all and any order in conflict herewith, and does hereby revoke the same; and "It is further ordered that this order shall remain in full force and effect until further order of this court.

"It is further ordered that a copy of this order shall be served upon any person in possession of or claiming possession of the property described.

"Done in chambers this 15th day of August, 1900.

"ARTHUR H. NOYES, Judge."

For this sweeping order against any and every person, whether a party to the suit or not, and this express requirement of the receiver to take possession, among other things, of all sluice boxes, machinery, pipe, boarding houses, tents, safes, scales, money, books of account, and all other personal property upon the claims, of whatsoever kind or nature, no basis of any kind appears from the records which have been brought here upon certiorari to have been presented to the court below, although the order recites upon its face that the court was "fully advised in the premises." Nor does it appear that the slightest attention was paid to an express provision of the very statute under which the court was created and existed, in terms prohibiting the appointment of a receiver in any action for the recovery of specific personal property (Alaska Code, sec. 753), nor to sections 301 or 475 of the same code, which provide as follows:

"SEC. 301. Any person who has a legal estate in real property, and a present right to the possession thereof, may recover such possession, with damages for withholding the same, by an action. Such action shall be commenced against the person in the actual possession of the property at the time, or, if the property be not in the actual possession of anyone, then against the person acting as the owner thereof."

"SEC. 475. Any person in possession, by himself or his tenant, of real property, may maintain an action of an equitable nature against another who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him for the purpose of determining such claim, estate, or interest."

It will be observed from these provisions that by the code governing Alaska an action of ejectment is required to be brought "against the person in the actual possession of the property at the time, or if the property be not in the actual possession of anyone, then against the person acting as the owner thereof;" and that the right to maintain an equitable action for the purpose of determing an adverse claim is only given to one in possession by himself or his tenant.

The successors in interest of the defendants to the suits having thus been denied an appeal from the orders granting the injunctions and appointing a receiver, not only of the mining claims in question, but of their personal property as well, with directions to the receiver to extract from the claims the gold which constituted their sole value, the defendants applied, with all speed possible, to a judge of this court for the allowance of the appeals which had been denied them in Alaska.

The judge of this court, to whom the applications were made, and upon a showing embracing much of this shocking record, at once granted the appeals, requiring and approving a supersedeas bond in each case in the sum of $20,000, and thereupon ordered a writ of supersedeas to issue out of this court under its seal in each case, and, in writing, approved the form thereof, staying all proceedings under the orders granting the injunctions and appointing the receiver, and further ordering the receiver to at once restore to the defendants from whom he had taken them the said mining claims, together with the gold, gold dust, and other personal property received by him under the orders appealed from. Certified copies of the order allowing the appeal in each case, together with certified copies of the assignment of errors and of the bond, were, with the original writ of supersedeas and the original citation in each case, filed in the lower court on the 14th day of September, 1900, and copies thereof at once served upon the receiver, McKenzie, and a demand made upon him for the restitution of the property, in accordance with the writs.

The evidence taken upon the hearing of these proceedings is to the effect, and we so find the fact to be, that the respondent McKenzie thereupon refused and continued to refuse to restore, in accordance with the requirements of the writs of supersedeas, the gold, gold dust, and other personal property received by him under the orders of the trial court, and that fact being made to appear to this court by affidavits on the 1st day of October, 1900, and it further being then made to appear to this cout that the last steamer for the season would leave the city of Seattle for Nome within a few days and that no further communication could be had with that section of the country until the spring or early summer of 1901, this court thereupon made an order directing its marshal to proceed to Nome, enforce its writs of supersedeas, arrest the offending receiver, and produce him at the bar of this court.

The evidence taken upon the hearing of these proceedings is also to the effect, and we so find the fact to be, that the respondent, McKenzie, at all times had it within his power to comply with the requirements of the writs of supersedeas issued out of this court; that he contumaceously refused to restore the gold, gold dust, and other personal property to the defendants, as required by those writs, and has continued such refusal ever since.

It is said by counsel for the respondent, McKenzie, that the action of Judge Noyes in refusing to allow the appeals petitioned for, and in refusing to settle any bill of exceptions, was based upon the opinion that no appeal is allowed by law from the orders made by him; and it is here so contended.

Provision is made by section 504 of the Alaska code for the taking and prosecution of an appeal from the final judgment of the district court for the district of Alaska, or any division thereof, direct to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases within which the present cases do not come, and it is then provided "that in all other cases, where the amount involved or the value of the subject-matter exceeds the sum of $5,000, the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit shall have jurisdiction to review upon writ of error or appeal the final judgment (and) orders of the district court." And section 507 of the same code declares that "an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of appeals from any interlocutory order granting or dissolving an injunction, refusing to grant or dissolve an injunction made or rendered in any cause pending before the district court within sixty days after the entry of such interlocutory order. The proceedings in other respects in the district court in the cause in which such interlocutory order was made shall not be stayed during the pendency of such appeal unless otherwise ordered by the district court."

Leaving out of consideration the last-quoted section, which in express terms authorizes an appeal from an order granting an injunction, and without considering the right of the defendants to the suits in question to thus have reviewed the orders enjoining them from working the mining claims involved in them, and as a necessary incident the right of the court to appoint a receiver of the property claimed by them, we think we may safely rest the jurisdiction of this court to review those orders upon section 504 of the Alaska Code above referred to. And it is for this court, subject to review of its action by the Supreme Court, to determine whether it may entertain jurisdiction of the cause removed and to dispose of controversies in respect to the form of its writs, the parties, the citation, and their service, without interference from any other court. (In re Chetworth, 165 U. S., 443.)

Courts take judicial notice of the general physical and climatic condition of the country within their jurisdiction. We therefore know judicially, as well as from the record in these cases, that the sole value of the mining claims in question consisted in the mineral contained in them. The extraction of that is, therefore, the taking of the very substance of the estate, and when all of it is removed nothing of value will remain in the claims. In the case of a vein or lode mine, with tunnels, drifts, and shafts in which there are timbers to be placed, replaced, or repaired, or water to be controlled, it sometimes happens that the appointment of a receiver becomes necessary to take possession of and operate the mine pending the litigation, in order to preserve the property; but even in that class of cases the necessity for a receiver is not of frequent occurrence.

This is well shown in the case of Bigbee v. Summerour (101 Ga., 201, 228, S. E. Rep., 642). So, too, in the case of placer mining claims valuable only for the oil contained in them, where it becomes necessary for the proper preservation of the claim that the ground be worked to prevent its substance from being drawn off by the operation of wells on adjoining ground, or where it is shown that a receiver is necessary in order that the annual work required by law may be performed for the benefit of the party who may ultimately be adjudged entitled to the ground. But nothing of that sort is shown to have existed with respect to the claims here involved. Here the gold in the claim would have remained as safe as it was during all the ages it had been there, and an injunction (assuming a proper showing for one to have been made) staying the working of the claims pending the litigation would have perfectly preserved the property for whomsoever might be ultimately adjudged to be entitled to it.

The value of mining property of every character, like the value of any other kind of property, largely depends upon the manner in which it is operated. Many good mines prove unprofitable because of loose management or extravagant methods of working them. The successors in interest of the defendant to the suits in which this receiver was appointed were in possession of the claims under a claim of right, and were engaged in mining the ground on a large scale, and had been so engaged during the working season of the year 1899, well as that of the then current season of 1900. They may, therefore, be properly presumed to have been, at least, somewhat familiar with the proper working of placer claims. But there is no evidence that the respondent ever saw a placer, or any other kind of mining claim before he was appointed receiver of these, and, at least, two other similar claims on the 23d day of July, 1900.

It is in evidence in at least one of the contempt proceedings now pending before us against McKenzie that, shortly before going to Alaska, he caused to be organized a corporation called the Alaska Gold Mining Company, with a capital stock of $15,000,000, a majority of which he held, and that, having placed a portion of the remainder where he thought it would stand him in good stead, he proceeded with Judge Noyes to Nome, arriving there on Saturday, July 21, 1900, and on Monday, July 23, before the court was organized and before the filing of any paper of any character with the clerk of the court, was appointed by Judge Noyes receiver of at least four of the richest claims in the district of Nome, upon complaints made by persons the interest therein of at least one of whom had theretofore been acquired by the receiver's corporation, the Alaska Gold Mining Company.

It has been already seen that the orders under which this was done in the present cases directed the receiver to take possession of and mine the claims in question, and enjoined the parties then in possession from in any manner interfering with the claims or with the acts of the receiver. It has been seen, also, that in the case of Rogers vs. Kjellman this was done upon a complaint which did not even ask for the appointment of a receiver or for such injunction, and in the case of Melsing et al. vs. Tornanses that the only relief that was asked was the granting of an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, all of which was granted by the court by the orders made by it on July 23, 1900.

We have no hesitation in holding that an order by which a placer-mining claim, whose proper preservation in no respect requires it, is taken from one who is in the actual possession thereof and turned over to a receiver, with instructions to extract from it its only value, is, in effect, a final decree, and appealable as such; for its entire value may be thus destroyed by improper working or extravagant management, or by the extraction of all its mineral, while he from whom it is taken and who asserts a right to it may prefer to work the claim to a limited extent only, or in a particular manner, or not at all. He may prefer to hold it for sale or other disposition; yet, under such orders as are here involved, the operations of the receiver of necessity constantly exhausts the very substance of the property, and may speedily render it absolutely worthless. Surely the authority, by whatever name called, under which such a result may be wrought is, in effect, a final judgment.

As was said by the circuit court of appeals for the third circuit, in Potter vs. Beal, 50 Fed. Rep., 63, the determination of the question as to what is or is not a final decree "is to be governed by the essence of what is done, and not by the appellation given to it." In the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company case, 129 U. S., 206, it was held that an order allowing a receiver of a mortgaged railroad to issue certificates which should be preferred to the mortgage was a final decree in effect and appealable. In the case of Sharon vs. Sharon, 67 Cal., 215, the supreme court of California held that an order made pendente lite directing the payment of alimony in a divorce suit is in the nature of a final decree and appealable as such. (See also the Tampa Railway Company case, 168 U. S., 583, 588, and Iron Co. vs. Meeker, 109 U. S., 180.) A mine is, as was held in Bigbee vs. Summerour, supra, destroyed as such as fast as the mineral is taken out; so that the necessary effect of the orders in question was to gradually, and perhaps rapidly, destroy the mining claims, and, as a matter of course, the personal property embraced by the orders would necessarily perish by use.

The remaining points urged on behalf of the respondent may be briefly disposed of. It is contended that in order to give effect to the orders made by Judge Morrow allowing the appeals it was essential to file the origina; orders in the lower court. Only certified copies of those orders were so filedl but the original citation and the original writ of supersedeas were filed in the lower court in these cases, together with certified copies of the assignment of errors and of the supersedeas bond. All of these papers were filed in the district court September 14, 1900. That that was sufficient to give effect to the appeal has been expressly decided by the Supreme Court in two cases—Brown vs. McConnell, 124 U. S., 489, and Stewart vs. Masterson, id., 493.

Section 1007 of the Revised Statutes declares:

"In any case where a writ of error may be a supersedeas the defendant may obtain such supersedeas by serving the writ of error, by lodging a copy thereof for the adverse party in the clerk's office where the record remains, within sixty days, Sundays exclusive, after the rendering of the judgment complained of, and giving the security required by law on the issuing of the citation. But if he desires to stay process on the judgment he may, having served his writ of error as aforesaid, give the security required by law within sixty days after the rendition of such judgment, or afterwards with the permission of a justice or judge of the appellate court; and in such cases where a writ of error may be a supersedeas execution shall not issue until the expiration of (the said term of sixty) (ten) days."

It is contended that the supersedeas thus provided for by statute does not require the restoration to the defendants, pending the appeal, of any property taken by the receiver. Let that be admitted, and the fact remains that, in each of these cases, Judge Morrow ordered a writ of supersedeas to be issued out of this court, under its seal, and, in writing, approved the form of the writs, each of which required the receiver, among other things, to restore to the possession of the defendants the personal property he had taken from them, together with the gold and gold dust extracted by him as such receiver from the claims. It is said that a single judge of this court can not grant a writ of supersedeas. Sections 1000 and 1007 of the Revised Statutes, the case In re Claasen, 140 U. S., 200, Rule 36 of the Supreme Court, and section 11 of the act, approved March 3, 1891, creating this court, conclusively answer this objection.

By section 11 of the circuit court of appeals act it is, among other things, provided that "any judge of the circuit court of appeals, in respect of cases brought or to be brought to that court, shall have the same powers and duties as to the allowance of appeals or writs of error, and the conditions of such allowance, as now by law belong to the justices or judges in respect of the existing courts of the United States, respectively." In the case, In re Claasen, supra, the Supreme Court held that a justice of the Supreme Court was authorized to grant a supersedeas, saying:

"By section 1000 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that every justice or judge signing a citation on any writ of error shall take security for the prosecution of the writ, and for costs, where the writ is not to be a supersedeas and stay of execution, and for damages and costs where it is to be. In a criminal case, there are no damages; and in such a case, the United States being a party, it is provided by subdivision 4 of rule 24 of this court that in cases where the United States are a party no costs shall be allowed in this court for or against the United States.

"Section 1007 of the Revised Statutes provides for the manner in which a supersedeas may be obtained on a writ of error. It is by serving the writ of error, by lodging a copy thereof for the adverse party in the clerk's office, where the record remains within sixty days, Sundays exclusive, after the rendering of the judgment complained of, and giving the security required by law on the issuing of the citation. But as there is no security required in a criminal case, the supersedeas may be obtained by merely serving the writ within the time prescribed, without giving any security, provided the justice who signs the citation directs that the writ shall operate as a supersedeas, which he may do when no security is required or taken.

"We hold, therefore, that the allowance of the supersedeas in the present case was proper, and we deny the motion to set it aside.

"To remove all doubt on the subject, however, in future cases, we have adopted a general rule, which is promulgated as rule 36 of this court (see 139 U. S., 706) and which embraces, also, the power to admit the defendant to bail after the citation is served."

The rule thus referred to and adopted by the Supreme Court will be found in 139 U. S., 706, and is as follows:

"1. An appeal or a writ of error from a circuit court or a district court direct to this court, in the cases provided for in sections 5 and 6 of the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, may be allowed, in term time or in vacation, by any justice of this court, or by any circuit judge within his circuit, or by any district judge within his district, and the proper security be taken and the citation signed by him, and he may also grant a supersedeas and stay of execution or of proceedings, pending such writ of error or appeal."

It is further contended that the scope of the writs was too broad, in that, in the first place, they went beyond the orders of Judge Morrow, and, in the second place, that it was beyond the power of the court to require the receiver to restore the property taken by him. It is true that the orders first made by Judge Morrow did not in terms direct the receiver so to restore the property, but in each case that judge subsequently, and on the same day, made an order expressly approving the form of the writs requiring such restoration. If it be conceded that the scope of the writs was too broad, it was not for the receiver to ignore their requirements and himself be the judge of that question, but his only proper remedy was a motion to modify the writs. While refusing to obey them he should not be heard to object to their scope.

In 2 High on Injunctions, section 1416, it is said that "If defendant is in doubt as to the scope or extent of the injunction, he should not be left to disregard or violate it, with a view of testing such questions, but should apply to the court for a modification or construction of its order."

The same rule is applicable to a receiver. (See, also, Wells, Fargo & Co. vs. Oregon Rwy. and Nav. Co., 19 Fed. Rep., 20; Ullman vs. Ritter, 72 Fed. Rep., 1000, 1003; Maginnis vs. Parkhurst, 4 N. J. Eq. Rep., 433, 436.) But the point itself is, we think, untenable.

In the leading case upon the subject, that of The State vs. Johnson, 13 Florida, 33, 48, it is said:

"The allowance of a supersedeas does not, nor does the order in this case, 'undo' or reverse the order of the circuit judge. The order, following the intent and effect of the law, in terms directs a stay of all proceedings under the several orders appealed from, and suspends their operation. The power of the circuit court was suspended, and thereby the power of all the officers in that court, under its orders in question, became inoperative. They no longer had any duties to perform under such orders. The authority of the receiver to continue to act as such was made nugatory by the operation of the law. He had entered upon an office and commenced to act, when the office was suspended. The supersedeas as understood by us, and as seems to be understood by the courts, does of necessity retroact by suspending the life of the order appealed from; reaches back to that order and forbids action under it.

"It does not make unlawful an act done in pursuance of the order before the appeal was taken, but it forbids the court and its officers further to act. No new rights having been created, and the duties of the receiver being superseded, the bond standing in the place of the property in his hands, and he having been notified thereof by proper process, it was his duty to restore that which had come to his hands to the parties from whom it had been taken and withheld; for his authority to take being inoperative by the suspension, his authority to hold was equally so, both being derived from the same order."

The case of State vs. Johnson has been several times approved. (Buckley vs. Georgia, 71 Miss., 580; Farmers' National Bank vs. Backus, 63 Minn., 115. See, also, Everett vs. State, 28 Md., 190; Freeman on Ex., 2 ed., sec. 271a, p. 876; High on Receivers, 3d ed., sec. 190, p. 164; 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. L., 110.)

In the last edition (Anderson's) of Beach on Receivers (p. 129, sec. 117) it is said that "from the authorities and reason there may be legally deduced the following principles which should govern questions concerning the subject of this section:

* * * * * * *

"2. If a receiver be appointed and takes possession of the property prior to the appeal and supersedeas, the consummation of the appeal with bond and supersedeas gives to the defendant the right to demand and have the property returned to him."

Finally, it is urged that the refusal of the receiver to obey the writs of supersedeas issued out of this court was based on the advice of his counsel that the writs were void. Such advice is never a justification of a contempt, but in proper cases may be considered in mitigation of the offense. (1 Beach on Injunctions, sec. 250; High on Injunctions, sec. 1427; Rogers vs. Pitt, 89 Fed. Rep., 424, and cases there cited.)

The circumstances attending the appointment of the receiver in these cases, however, and his conduct after as well as before the appointment, as shown by the record and evidence, so far from impressing us with the sincerity of the pretension that his refusal to obey the writs issued out of this court was based upon the advice of his counsel that they were void, satisfy us that it was intentional and deliberate, and in furtherance of the high-handed and grossly illegal proceedings initiated almost as soon as Judge Noyes and McKenzie had set foot on Alaskan territory at Nome, and which may be safely and fortunately said to have no parallel in the jurisprudence of this country.

And it speaks well for the good, sober sense of the people gathered on that remote and barren shore that they depended solely upon the courts for the correction of the wrongs thus perpetrated among and against them, which always may be depended upon to right, sooner or later, wrongs properly brought before them. And it is well, in these days of the rapid extension of our national domain, for all persons, whether residing in remote regions or nearer home, to remember that courts which respect themselves and have a due regard for the administration of justice and the maintenance of law and order will never tolerate any disobedience of their lawful orders, writs, or judgments, wherever committed within their jurisdiction.

"It is inherent in the nature of judicial authority," said the supreme court of Florida in the case of State vs. Johnson, supra, that "every court may protect and maintain its jurisdiction under the law, and that it shall protect itself against all attempts to resist or thwart or overthrow its authority. Without the power to judge of its jurisdiction, it is practically without jurisdiction. Without the power to enforce its judgments, it has no judicial authority. That it be made the plaything of whomsoever may choose to deride its judgments or its process and ignore its existence and its acts, because the opinions of the judges and the judgments of the court may not meet the approval of counsel upon the one side or the other of a controversy or may not be in accordance with the opinions or the wishes of subordinate officers, can not be allowed without surrendering the judicial character and confessing the impotency of this department of the Government.

"Courts commit errors, and parties may suffer from the improvidence or corruption of their judges, yet the remedy for these is not in individual resistance or in a resort to private judgment. Every court will hear the appeals of those who conceive themselves to be wronged or threatened with injustice by the execution of its decrees. If its errors be made apparent, it will do justice to itself by dealing justice to parties without fear and without hesitation. There is no excuse for resistance of the orders of the courts in this country where their doors are wide open, and where every human being may be heard in the presence of the whole people."

In the refusal of the respondent Alexander McKenzie to obey the writs of supersedeas issued out of this court, as hereinbefore found and stated, it is now here considered and adjudged that he did commit contempts of this court, and for the said contempt so committed in the case entitled Tornanses vs. Melsing et al. it is now here ordered and adjudged that he, the said Alexander McKenzie, be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Alameda, Cal., for the period of six months, and for the said contempt so committed in the case entitled Kjellman vs. Rogers that he be imprisoned in the jail of the said county for a like period of six months, making one year in all, the sentence imposed in the said last-mentioned case to commence immediately upon the completion of the term of imprisonment under the first sentence herein.

The marshal will execute this judgment forthwith.

United States circuit court of appeals for the Ninth circuit. John I. Tornanses, appellant, vs. L. F. Melsing et al., respondents. William A. Kjellman, appellant, vs. Henry Rogers, respondent. Filed February 12, 1901.

MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT.

Based upon our understanding of the statement of counsel in two of the companion cases against the respondent McKenzie for alleged contempt of the process of this court that all of the pending cases against him had been, in so far as the parties thereto are concerned, settled, and that the respondent had restored to the parties from whom it had been taken the whole of the property in controversy, we so stated in the opinion delivered herein February 11.

The court is now informed that this is a mistake of fact in respect to the present cases, and that in these cases there has been no settlement as respects the parties, and there is no showing of the restoration by the receiver of the property in the above-entitled cases as required by the writs of supersedeas issued out of this court. The paragraph of the opinion of this court rendered February 11, in which the erroneous statement of fact was made, will therefore be corrected, and the judgment entered in these cases at the same time will be, and hereby is, so modified as to direct that the respondent pay all the costs of the contempt proceedings herein, to be taxed by the court.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have a very few remarks to make. I have been familiar with mining litigation and the making and enforcing of the mining laws for over fifty years. The mining laws grew up among the miners themselves. The nonaction of the Government for twenty years enabled them to make their own laws and regulations. The courts recognized their laws, and the early reports of California contain numerous decisions construing the laws of the miners, their rights of possession, etc. More than a million and a half people in the Western States and Territories lived under and their rights were predicated upon the mining laws which were thus made. They were trespassers.

In 1865 a case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, Strong v. Sparrow, to be found reported in 3 Wall., in which the question arose as to whether the miners had any rights, being trespassers under the law. I participated in the argument of that case. Judge Black was my colleague. Mr. O'Connor, of New York, and Mr. Ticknor Curtis were on the other side. They attempted to show that those people had no rights, and that there was no property which would give the court jurisdiction, as it required property of the value of $1,000. The court said they could not shut their eyes to the history of the country; that they could not deny that property had grown up in that way; and they refused to dismiss the appeal.

The Chief Justice did me the honor to suggest, however, that some remarks which I had made in the Senate and which had been taken down, with regard to the history of mining, be incorporated in the appendix as explanatory of their decision, which was done. You will find it in 3 Wallace.

I make this remark to show that I have some familiarity with the practice in such cases. In the first place, the people demanded—those who had developed mines—that property should not be taken away from them, although they were aliens, and that they should be given an opportunity, even after they made their location, to declare their intention. The Supreme Court held that they might do that, because exploring for mines is no easy task, and exploring for mines in the Arctic region is a very laborious task. Few of us are going to be engaged in it, and, with respect to those who had found mines in Alaska when this matter came up, it seemed to me cruel to talk about robbing them of the fruits of their pioneer labors. I could not understand how anybody could have the heart to do so cruel a thing. I had some feeling in that case and in that discussion. The Senate was with me in it. Congress adjourned on the 7th of June, 1900. On the 21st of July, Noyes and McKenzie and some others arrived at Nome, and on the Monday following, immediately, six of the principal claims were taken into possession by the receiver.

The matter of the granting of receiverships in the case of placer mines had been discussed and understood in all that region. No receivership had ever been granted in any case that I ever heard of where it was not necessary to preserve the property. Where there were pumping works or something of that kind the court would do it to preserve the property, but I do not suppose in all history there have been half a dozen receiverships granted even in those cases. But a receiver in a placer mining claim where gold is being taken out was not heard of. Just think of it! What guaranty has the defendant if the placer mine is taken? They say they will let him see the clean up. They can clean up every hour—any time they have a mind to clean up. Just think of putting uncounted gold into the hands of irresponsible parties, and taking it from those who own it! The thing shocked every mining man who had any knowledge of the country. Such a proceeding was never heard of before, and if Judge Noyes was honest in that he was utterly incompetent. There is no precedent for it.

Just think for a moment! It was not necessary to appoint a receiver in order to preserve the property; but gold was being taken out. I have known an injunction to be granted to stop the taking out of gold by either party, because it could not be counted. That is frequent. But receivers, where you put the gold in the hands of a stranger to the proceeding, was never dreamed of in the whole practice for fifty years. No case can be found where a receiver for a placer mining claim has been granted by any court. If the title was in doubt, the court would be bound to interfere, but it would simply interfere by injunction to preserve the property. But to allow one party to take out gold, and say that he can account for it and pay every dollar, was not heard of. How does anybody know? A court would say, "We can not know what you take out, and we will not let you take any out."

These receivers were appointed, and that practice was considered throughout the whole country there. Not only that, but men frequently wrote to me who had claims there that they had stopped working them; that they did not dare to open them because they feared they would be taken from them. Judge Noyes refused parties the right of appeal, and the investigation made by the court of the conduct of the parties connected with that refusal is a chapter in the history of the country.

To say that Judge Ross, or Gilbert, or Morrow was actuated by low motives is to impeach men of as high character and as fine judicial records as anybody in the country.

Judge Ross, who used the strongest language of any of them, stands as high as any judicial officer in the United States. He was regarded when he was on the supreme bench of California as a remarkably strong judge. His decisions were read with pleasure by the bar and quoted everywhere. He was honored and respected. Mr. Cleveland appointed him to the district bench, and his record there has continued to do him credit, and he has given satisfaction to the entire community. I do not know any man on the bench anywhere whose record is finer than that of Judge Ross as a judicial officer. The other judges have not been on the bench so long, but they have honorable records, and if anybody will read these records that they have made, he will see that they examined this case carefully.

It is true they said they would only speak of the contempt. That contempt was involved in the conspiracy. There were a good many parties connected with thwarting the judgment of the court. The taking of evidence lasted for two or three months. Then, for anybody to come here and arraign those judges by outside statements is folly. What has been uttered against them but the unsupported declamations of Senators; and they went so far on yesterday as to object to the printing in the RECORD of the judgment of the court, so that everybody could see it. The idea of attacking a court and denouncing them as monstrously unjust, and refusing to allow the opinion which the court rendered and their proceedings to be put in the RECORD. When any honest man reads what these judges have said, and knows their character and sees the evidence taken, he will say that those judges have done their duty, although a painful one. The whole country will sustain them, and no fair-minded lawyer or judge will sustain a judge in granting promiscuously ex parte receiverships, taking possession of the whole country, blighting its prospects for years. The thing is unheard of.

I care not what the character of these men may have been before. It is nothing to me. I look at these general sweeping receiverships of gold mines, which no court ever before thought of doing—placing it in the power of outside parties to return what they will. In cases of disputed title—and it has to be a strong case—injunctions have been granted. But here we have the receivership, and an injunction to protect the receiver. Then we have the denial of an appeal even. Then we have resistance to the orders of the superior court when they reviewed and set aside these orders of the court below in granting receiverships. We have all that at length in a document which will now be printed, and the country will judge and judge fairly. No injustice will be done anywhere, but if the record made by the circuit court of appeals at San Francisco does not stand, I shall be very much mistaken.

Have not Noyes and McKenzie characters to sustain? Is not their position such as to justify them in guarding everything so dear to them? If the court garbled the testimony and condemned these men without cause; if they have committed the outrages as depicted here by Senators, they ought to be impeached. Either Judge Noyes and his party are guilty of the things charged against them by that court and that judgment against them is correct, or the court of appeals at San Francisco ought to be abolished and the judges impeached. It becomes a matter of honor and veracity and integrity between that high court and these speculators in receiverships, the like of which was never seen before. That is what this is. That is what the country will understand. It is settled. No argument can change it.

I am thankful that the Attorney-General this year sent an honest man up there—Judge Wickersham. He is holding court. Nobody doubts his honesty. All is quiet. Men have gone back, and are opening their claims. Prosperity is being restored at Nome. The people fear nothing there now. Judge Wickersham was in another part of Alaska. He was assigned to that field, and everything is right at Nome. There is nothing now to be done. These parties will not go back to Alaska. They will do no more harm. Nobody has any pecuniary or other interest in pursuing them, and I would not have said a word if it had not been for the attacks made upon the court. I would not have said a word but for the fact that the extraordinary proceeding was taken by Judge Noyes of granting receiverships for gold dust. No lawyer can find a case like that. I know there is none, because I have kept the run of litigation in the mining regions all the time. There is no case parallel to this at all. It was an unparalleled procedure, which, whether they stole anything or not, gave the receiver and his party an opportunity which no court would grant to anybody. If it were necessary to protect the property, a court would grant an injunction, as I said before. These being the facts, I thought it necessary to say this much.

Just one word more, Mr. President. My venerable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] got into a little error yesterday. I call his attention to it. Of course he will correct it. He stated here that he predicated his opinion mostly upon what the lamented Senator Davis had said. The Senator from Massachusetts said that parties came to him with their grievances, and he heard them carefully, and that they had no papers. That was after the receivers had been appointed out there, and he said:

> I also suggested to them that as Alaska was at so great a distance a long time must elapse before there could be a thorough investigation if witnesses were summoned here who knew the facts; that they had better say to the Attorney-General that it occurred to me that in so grave a matter he ought to dispatch at once a competent commissioner, in whose ability and character every man would confide, who should investigate the case on the spot and report to him his conclusions by telegraph for the action of the Department and the President. At his request I wrote a note to the Attorney-General stating that.
> Afterwards I stated, not to the committee itself, but to such members of it as I had opportunity to confer with, what I had said and done and what had been said to me. Thereupon Mr. Senator Davis, of Minnesota, then an honored and very influential member of the committee, as of the Senate, told me that he knew Judge Noyes thoroughly through and through; that he knew a good deal about the merits of this controversy as the result of inquiries, and that he believed Judge Noyes was entirely right.
> He said there were reasons, which he stated, which I will not undertake to repeat now, where some extraordinary action of the court, possibly in appointing a receiver who was connected with one or two parties in interest—I am not sure, however, about that—was rendered necessary by the peculiar conditions there, and that it was necessary to act in a certain way to save the employment of very considerable bodies of men who, if that business were at once arrested, would be thrown out of employment and reduced to extreme hardship and poverty. Senator Davis spoke to me from time to time afterwards. He was full of the matter and very zealus in the belief which I have stated.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will explain this. I do not do it to make any attack upon him, but to show how men are liable to be mistaken. The Congress adjourned on the 7th of June. It will be remembered that Noyes arrived there on the 21st of July, and these proceedings occurred in July, August, and September, and the committee of the Senate were not in session again while Senator Davis was alive. He was taken sick some time in the fall—October I believe—and died on the 27th of November, 1900, and could not possibly have known anything about this transaction. It could not have become a matter before the committee, because it only came up in the following year. It appeared here along in January, 1901. Nobody here that I am aware of had ever heard of it while Senator Davis was well and alive. The Senator from Massachusetts must be altogether mistaken about this conversation upon which he predicated his judgment in this case, and I hope he will correct the error, if it is an error, or show us how it is possible that it can be true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I will incidentally mention the fact that I saw in one of these documents, which very few people will read, a statement which corroborates what my friend the Senator from Nevada has just said about the injustice of these receiverships. If I am not mistaken, I saw in one of these documents a statement coming from one of the judges, as one reason for their action, that McKenzie as receiver had collected or got out of the mine $100,000, and had reported only $35,000.

Mr. TELLER. Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. And $35,000 for expenses.

Mr. TILLMAN. And $35,000 for expenses. The balance disappeared, with no bondsman or anything else anywhere from whom the owners of the mines, when the final determination was made, could recover. That shows that the Senator's contention as to a receivership for a mine——

Mr. STEWART. A placer mine——

Mr. TILLMAN. A placer mine is rather a dangerous thing.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that Judge Noyes appointed an accountant to find out how much had been taken out of the mine—he can hardly be charged with being opposed to McKenzie—and he found that $100,000 had been taken. There is a deficit of $65,000 in one single case.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, if the Secretary will report the pending amendment we will soon finish the bill.

The SECRETARY. On page 44 it is proposed to strike out lines 11 to 16, inclusive, as follows:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, and the land office of said district will be continued at Sitka. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued, such business shall be transferred to the Sitka office.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill to allow this amendment to be passed over for the present. The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has been called from the Chamber, and he is desirous of making some observations upon it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not desire to interfere with anything the Senator from Georgia may want to say, but as a member of the committee I have some documents here which throw some light on this matter. If the Senator from Texas is especially anxious that the matter shall go over, I am perfectly willing to wait until the Senator from Georgia returns, or I will go forward now.

Mr. HALE. I can not agree to let the bill be suspended, but we can go now to one or two other amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will wait until the Senator from Georgia returns, or if he fails to return before we get to final action I will ask some questions about the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The pending amendment will be temporarily passed by.

Mr. HALE. Let us return to page 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the committee on page 22.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 22, after line 10, to strike out:

For the proper shelter and protection of officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States lawfully on duty in the Philippine Islands, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $500,000.

And insert:

MILITARY POST.

For the establishment in the vicinity of Manila, P. I., of a military post, including the construction of barracks, quarters for officers, hospital, storehouses, and other buildings, as well as water supply, lighting, sewerage, and drainage, necessary for the accommodation of a garrison of two full regiments of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery, to be available until expended, $500,000.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator who has this bill in charge would explain to the Senate why the House provision is stricken out of the bill and this one is proposed to be put in.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Then I want to ask him whether there is any proposition here or anywhere else that he knows of to provide other buildings at other places or whether we are to confine ourselves entirely to Manila?

Mr. HALE. The reason why it has been done is that the Appropriations Committee, upon the proper bill, has always taken jurisdiction of the question of Army posts. The committee has struck out the clause as it passed the House and has put it in the language of the estimates, the language which the Appropriations Committee has always followed in establishing and maintaining Army posts.

If I may refer to the proceedings in the other House, the suggestion was made there that the construction of a new building was subject to a point of order, and the chairman of the committee, finding the difficulty, changed the language, and the House adopted the provision which is found in lines 11, 12, 13, and 14. But, as I said, the Committee on Appropriations, believing that the jurisdiction of the subject-matter is with that committee, as it always has been, and not subject to any other committee, restored the language of the estimates and restored what has been the invariable practice.

On the sundry civil bill we provide for the next year for certain Army posts that we locate in terms. This is needed now. The debate in the House showed that, and the Department is desirous of entering upon the work and not waiting until July.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now the amendment on page 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment on page 30, which was temporarily passed over.

Mr. HALE. I think it was at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that that amendment was also passed over.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the amendment in regard to the purchase of boats. I requested that it be passed over. There are some inquiries which I should like to make. I wish to get some light. If the Senator will get the document which he kindly furnished me yesterday (Senate Report No. 330) bearing on this subject, he will find at the bottom of page 2 a paragraph in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which I will read.

The money expended for the property above mentioned is needed in the Philippine Islands at present, and as the Secretary of War has asked that settlement be made at an early date it is requested that the sum herein asked for, when appropriated, be made immediately available.

Now, there is a very queer condition of affairs over there. First, we have a civil government under the Taft Commission which is appropriating millions, as we find here in the laws which we have—a whole book of them—and yet the Secretary of War steps up to the Secretary of the Navy and says, "Here, you owe the insular government some money for some boats and ordnance stores, and I want you to settle."

I think that Senators owe it to themselves to clarify this nebulous situation and let us understand whether we have a civil government there or whether the civil government is simply a pro forma annex, so to speak, of the military occupation.

Of course we thought that the civil government was a part and parcel of the machinery of government supplied by what was called the Spooner amendment, which authorized the President to govern (I do not remember the exact words; the Senators will recall them) all officers, judicial, civil, military, etc. Now, the Secretary of War appearing here as the man who is spurring the Secretary of the Navy befuddles us.

Then, if you go on still further, we are worse befuddled on this other point than we are as to who is going to get this money and why he should get it. On the next page, page 3——

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator to what point he has referred?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have just read it. I will read it again. It is in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in which an explanation is given as to why this money ought to be appropriated in the urgent deficiency bill. Secretary Long says:

The money expended for the property above mentioned—

I do not read the whole letter. I have read it, but I am not reading it in connection with what I am saying.

The money expended for the property above mentioned is needed in the Philippine Islands at present, and as the Secretary of War has asked that settlement be made at an early date it is requested that the sum herein asked for, when appropriated, be made immediately available.

What I am endeavoring to get at is why the Secretary of War is trying to collect the debts of the United States due the insular government if that government is under the Taft Commission. Why does not Mr. Taft step forward and ask that his government be reimbursed?

Mr. HALE. He does.

Mr. TILLMAN. Where does he do it?

Mr. HALE. I am not going into the history of events in the Philippine Islands, because that would take too long; but in brief we had it this morning in a very interesting fashion in the Committee on the Philippines. Governor Taft was there and explained the association of the civil and the military power and the gradual development of the civil side of the government. It was all under the War Department at first, and the care and responsibility have all the time been largely left in that Department. For a time the Army exercised both military and quasi-civilian powers. It appointed civil officers whose duties were not military, but of a civic character, and conjoined the two.

The President was desirous of engrafting upon that actual civil government, and we had two commissions. The first Philippine Commission which went out made certain recommendations, and then we had the appointment of an actual civil government, a civilian and other officers under him, and the civil part of the government has been turned over to that tribunal, at the head of which is Governor Taft.

Now, that is given powers to raise revenue and to legislate. It sounds absurdly to some people, and I am not very much in love with it myself, to find a commission issuing an act declaring "Be it enacted by the Commission," but they do that. They impose duties. They have an insular revenue. They spend money, sometimes large sums, in the building of roads. Their revenues—and that is why this is here—have been depleted to this extent in purchasing, at the time when the civil and military government was running along together, these vessels for use. They were used under the War Department, but when the Navy intervened, and large numbers of our troops were sent there, they were turned over to the Navy, which is now using the vessels in the shoal waters. As it has entirely gone from the control of the insular civil government there, the Secretary of War, under whom all this formula was carried on, recommends that that treasury be compensated for this expenditure. Whether that is the best way to do things I do not know. It has been found in administration by the course of events that it has worked successfully to some extent.

But I will say to the Senator there is no question about the fact which has been established, that these vessels were bought and paid for, and that this is a proper amount. If the Senate do not see fit to reimburse the funds of the insular government the civil government there will have so much less in their treasury to use.

We are doing the same thing in the provision of the bill that has been reported to the Senate from the Committee on the Philippines. We provide for collecting duties, because we believe the machinery can be better supplied in that way, and then, instead of covering it into a general treasury fund, it is segregated and returned to the Philippine civil government and goes into their treasury.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right there, if the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to page 3 of this little report, which accompanies the urgency deficiency bill. In a letter from D. D. V. Stuart, commander, of the United States Navy, senior member of an appraisal board, I find the following paragraph:

> In reply to a letter addressed to the senior squadron commander and referred by him to the commandant of the naval station, Cavite, the board is informed that the date of receipt of these vessels is not known, nor is it known from whom they were received, nor their condition at the time they were turned over to the naval authorities.

Well, here is another nebulous condition which comes in connection with these vessels. While I am asking for an explanation I will point out all of the unsatisfactory conditions attending this appropriation, which I wish the Senator in charge of the bill to explain. Further on Commander Stuart says:

> The letter from the governor-general's office also informs the board that the armed transport General Alava and the gunboats Quiros and Villalobos were purchased by Maj. C. P. Miller, U. S. A., on February 21, 1900, at a cost of $215,000 Mexican currency, and were immediately turned over to the Navy.

Now, I want an explanation as to how anybody in the Philippines of a private station acquired a gunboat. I had supposed that gunboats were vessels of war, or of offense and defense, and any that were there were either in the possession of the insurgents or of the Spaniards. I see no mention made of any purchase from the Spanish Government. We have, of course, only the information which is here, and this information is not satisfactory to me, and I do not suppose it would be satisfactory to the Senator. I want to know from him how these gunboats were bought and from whom. I can understand how a transport steamer should be bought in open market from some Filipino or some Chinaman or some other outlandish yellow man over there, but I just want to know how you buy gunboats.

Mr. HALE. That does not trouble me any. It is simply a designation of the kind of ship. They are not engaged in any war. We call them gunboats. They are small vessels of that class, and they are engaged in patrol duty.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will call the Senator's attention to the following item on page 4 of this report:

> To thirteen gunboats purchased by Lieut. Col. J. W. Pope, United States Army, and transferred to the Navy by Maj. John T. Knight.

Mr. HALE. That appears in the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course; I am reading from the report.

Mr. HALE. As to whom they were purchased from, I do not know. I have not felt that it was essential to inquire.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, as the House committee did not see fit to insert this item, and the Senate committee has done it, does it not appear that we might just let it go out until we get some information as to how gunboats have been bought before we take some money collected from American taxpayers and spend it over there to purchase gunboats that possibly we captured?

I do not like to appear suspicious or invidious in this matter; I do not want to charge any of our people over there with undue disregard of the laws of meum and tuum; but we have been discussing matters this morning in connection with our nearer territories, and I confess that most of this meat appears to be poison to me. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will permit this item to go out.

Mr. HALE. No; I could not consent to that. It is——

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator ought to be able to defend it and explain it.

Mr. HALE. If I have not explained it satisfactorily the Senate can strike it out.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course if the Senator is going to fall back on his well-disciplined majority——

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. And ask them to stand by what the Appropriations Committee has done, I know what that means. Of course, in that case, as a small fragment or fraction of the Appropriations Committee, I will have simply to subside. But I shall ask for a vote on it.

Mr. HALE. I can only repeat, and it is repeating, that these vessels were bought and paid for out of the insular fund. I have no doubt that the amount is correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no evidence here to that effect, because Commander Stuart tells us that he can not find from whom they were bought, nor when nor where they were turned over to the Navy.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Navy adopts and sends in Commander Stuart's letter, and then recommends, and recommends in strong language, that this payment shall be made. He says that these insular funds that have been depleted so much ought to be reimbursed to this extent. It is rather novel that there are two kinds of government out there, but there is. There is an insular government——

Mr. TILLMAN. Then as to the other phase of the subject, where did these ordnance stores come from that the War Department or the civil government has sold to the Navy?

Mr. HALE. I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I confess I am a little more curious to know than the Senator appears to be. I am not willing to have the taxes of the American people paid out in this way, however small this amount may be. It is a mere bagatelle; but I am sick and tired of seeing good money poured into that Filipino rat hole. And the Senator himself has not had much stomach for it. I am surprised to see him stand here and defend something that he would not ordinarily do but for his association with this bill as a representative of his party.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely satisfied that it is a proper item and ought to go in. I have not any doubt about it whatever. I do not find fault with the Senator because he is not satisfied. The Senate has to settle it. I can give him no further explanation than I have done. Here are the facts. The Secretary of the Navy adopts the statement and recommends the appropriation. The facts are undisputed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read another paragraph that the Senator says is undisputed. Commander Stuart says in his letter of July 22, 1901:

> Letters were written to the military governor and to the commandant of of the naval station, Cavite, requesting that the board should be furnished with copies of all vouchers on file in their respective offices concerning the property in question.

The Senator says he has no doubt about it, yet Commander Stuart says:

> Replies were received to these letters on June 25 and 28, respectively, but the information contained in these replies was not sufficient on which to base an inventory and appraisal such as is ordered by the commander in chief.

In other words, the fact as to whether this money was honestly paid out of the insular fund or not does not appear in the record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment has not been read to the Senate. It will now be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Are these gunboats now being used by the United States?

Mr. HALE. Yes; they have been turned over to the Navy Department, and they are using them for patrol duty in shallow water. That is why the appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Maine, that these are small steamers which were purchased by the Army, and they may have put small guns on them for aught I know during the operations there, in order that they might go from one place to another. The Army paid for them out of the funds, I understand.

Mr. HALE. Yes; they were paid for out of the insular funds.

Mr. ALLISON. Out of the fund of the Army.

Mr. HALE. Not from the Army appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all, but they were paid out of the insular funds. The Army turned them over to the Navy to do patrol duty, and the Navy now asks that the insular fund may be reimbursed to that extent. I do not suppose they put everything in the letter which was transmitted.

Mr. TILLMAN. But what about the ordnance?

Mr. HALE. That is included.

Mr. TILLMAN. But where, how, in what possible way could private parties get hold of ordnance stores?

Mr. HALE. Why, many of them.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate is more confiding than I am.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure. I want light if I can get it.

Mr. FORAKER. At the foot of page 3 of the document from which the Senator from South Carolina was reading a moment ago commences a report made by a board appointed to investigate this whole subject, and I think if the Senator will read that he will see that all the information has been given that it is probably possible to secure.

Mr. TILLMAN. But if the Senator will look he will see that that very board says:

> In making this recommendation the board would state that the information furnished is incomplete.

Mr. FORAKER. It is incomplete; and we can readily understand why it might be incomplete. There was not perhaps time to make complete records under all the circumstances when this transaction was had.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. But the board report that they have made a careful investigation, and in conclusion they recommend that reimbursement be made to the insular revenues; that is to say, they find that all these boats and certain ordnance stores were purchased and paid for with insular funds, that the amounts charged are reasonable and proper, and then they conclude, as the Senator from South Carolina was about to read, as follows:

> In making this recommendation the board would state that the information furnished is incomplete, and the amount of reimbursement recommended is the actual amount paid for the vessels as shown by the records furnished by the office of the military governor, less the amount of the value of ordnance and ordnance stores shown by the same records. This amount is not considered by the board to be excessive for the 17 vessels in question.
> In regard to the stores issued to these vessels and repairs to them since their receipt, paid for from insular funds, the board has not been able to collect sufficient data to make a report therefrom.

Now, Mr. President, it does appear from this report that they have had some difficulty in getting at the facts. The records, they say, are not complete, yet from the records to which they have had access and which they have examined they do find that 17 vessels were purchased, and they give the names of the 17 vessels that were paid for out of the insular funds. They were purchased by an officer of the United States Army, and along with the purchase of these vessels certain ordnance stores, amounting to more than $80,000 in value, were also purchased. The vessels alone, purchased and paid for out of the insular funds, were turned over to the Navy.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will stop right there for a moment, I will give the Senator from Maine some light. The report states that these ordnance stores were purchased with the boats, proving that the boats were vessels of war when we bought them, and they were not turned into patrol boats and armament put on them by our people. The point with me, which has not been brought out by anybody concerned, is for the Navy Department, or the Army, or Governor Taft, or anybody else who is willing to furnish the light to tell us who it was in Manila who had vessels of war for sale that we had not captured.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand——

Mr. TILLMAN. The point I want to make is that this whole business is entirely too slipshod and slack twisted for an honest government.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not find it anywhere stated that these were vessels of war when they were purchased. I understand from reading——

Mr. TILLMAN. I just said that I infer they were vessels of war.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me a minute, I understand from reading what is before us that there was a necessity for small boats to be equipped for use as gunboats, and an officer of the Army cast about and found vessels suitable for that purpose and purchased them; that they were paid for out of the insular funds and then they were transferred to the Navy, when they were equipped and fitted up for use as gunboats, and they are carried into this account as gunboats purchased in that way.

I do not think there is anything extraordinary about it. Certainly when business was transacted as under such circumstances it necessarily had to be, there is nothing extraordinary that there is not as accurate an account as the Department would have been glad to have had before them when they made this examination, but they do say they were perfectly satisfied from an examination of the records that all these boats were purchased and were paid for; that the amounts paid are reasonable, and that they were paid for out of the insular funds.

It is now simply a question whether or not the insular funds should be reimbursed by the United States Government, these ships having passed over to the United States Government and having been made a part of the United States Navy. It seems to me that we having gotten the boats and our own board having made a report that the amount paid is reasonable, we ought to reimburse the funds out of which the payment was made.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Ohio is so well satisfied in his own mind with this whole scheme of colonial expansion or imperialism, or whatever other thing we may call it, that he has not got his usual specs on. He does not see things, simply because he does not want to see them, if he will pardon me, not that I impugn his motives or would attack his sincerity; but there is so much of the "of course" business about this, that it must be so because we find it in this document, I can not help but express some little surprise as to why it is that these officers first tell us that they can not find anybody from whom the vessels were bought. That is in the first letter.

> The board is informed—
> Says Commander Stuart—
> that the date of receipt of these vessels is not known, nor is it known from whom they were received, nor their condition at the time they were turned over to the naval authorities.

So we find that money is being handled out there in a loose, slipshod way, no record kept, no receipts, no documents, no accounting, no anything which is necessary and usual in order to keep down thievery. But if Senators are satisfied, and continue to press this matter after the House has refused to put it in, I will just simply have to ask the Senate to vote for it on the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the statement in the report indicates that the ordnance was originally purchased by the United States, and as it has been turned over again to the United States, they have subtracted that amount, $82,457.60, from the total value of the vessels and ordnance.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, it would indicate that this $532,500 included $82,457.60 worth of ordnance and ordnance stores; and therefore the deduction of $82,457.60 from it would indicate that that has gone to the chief ordnance officer of the United States Army, and is therefore not chargeable against the Navy. That is all it proves.

Mr. TELLER. I think it proves that $532,500 had been expended for ordnance and ordnance stores, and we are now giving a credit of $82,457.60, the value of the ordnance, or rather it indicates to me that they had delivered the ordnance over to the Government as ordnance unused.

Mr. TILLMAN. Delivered it over to the Army.

Mr. TELLER. Well, delivered it over somewhere. It does not make any difference whether it was delivered to the Army or the Navy. It goes into the funds of our Government instead of those of the insular government. It is not worth while to make very much fuss about this little bit of an item—only four hundred and fifty odd thousand dollars—compared with what we are expending, and we are told there is not enough income over there to keep the new civil government going. So, of course, we have got to put up the money.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, did not the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] demonstrate the other day by figures that they had a surplus of several million dollars over there more than they had been called on so far to spend? Then, how can the Senator get his consent to argue that they have not got money enough until they themselves so report, when their own report shows they have more than they need?

Mr. TELLER. I found in this document or some other a statement that they were short of funds, and that they want more money. I am very sure of that.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure, if the Senator will allow me, no matter whether they are short or long of funds, if this sum was paid out of the insular fund and the property has been turned over to the United States Government, now belongs to it, and is being used by it, we ought to reimburse that fund.

Mr. TELLER. That might depend on what we are using it for. What are we using it for? We are using it, I suppose, to defend those islands.

Mr. HALE. Not only to defend them, but——

Mr. TILLMAN. To subjugate them.

Mr. TELLER. Is that what we are using it for?

Mr. HALE. We are making contracts there for the improvement of harbors and large contracts for roads, and we shall undoubtedly have to appropriate, as the Senator says, from our own revenues for the expenses of the Philippine Islands. In fact, the Philippine tariff bill before the Senate provides that all the money collected on duties, instead of being put into the Treasury of the United States, as I said a few minutes ago, is to be turned back to them because they need it. We have got that government there running and doing its own work, and it involves the expenditure of a great deal of money. They will not have money enough in the Philippine Islands to pay all the bills, and nobody supposes they will.

Mr. BACON. I have no desire, Mr. President, except to have definite information from the Senator from Maine. If he is prepared to give the information as definitely being within his knowledge, I shall be content. I understood the Senator to say that these particular boats, which are here denominated gunboats, were purchased from private individuals and converted afterwards into gunboats. But they were not gunboats at the time they were purchased. Has the Senator any information to that effect?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that was the case. They were transports, boats that could be adapted to any service. The word "gunboat," as the Senator knows, is a very elastic kind of word. It does not always mean a war vessel. Those vessels are engaged in what you may call semiwar; they are patroling the islands and preventing supplies going in to the Filipinos. If there is a condition of war they are engaged upon our side. I suppose if the Senator and I should see one of those so-called gunboats in comparison with one of the great crafts that we build here and call gunboats, we would not observe much resemblance between them. They are small, fragile craft.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not replying directly to the inquiry I made. I asked for information, and the Senator is giving a dissertation upon the character of gunboats, the size of boats, etc.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator's question was directed to that point.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; the question I asked the Senator was whether he, as the Senator in charge of this bill, has definite information that these boats which are termed gunboats were not gunboats at the time they were purchased, but have since been so converted?

Mr. HALE. I so believe. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BACON. Because if they were gunboats——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. I will not trespass long upon the Senate. If they were gunboats at the time they were purchased, of course there was no private individual authorized to sell them. They were the capture or prize of war belonging to the United States Government without being so purchased. That is what I desired to ascertain. But the Senator does not seem to have definite information. He has what he says is satisfactory to his own mind.

Now, it is true that this is a comparatively small amount, as we estimate amounts here, as stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], $450,000 in Mexican money——

Mr. TELLER. I said a comparatively small amount.

Mr. BACON. I say comparatively, as estimated here, as we are in the habit of disposing of very much larger amounts.

Mr. TELLER. If I may interrupt the Senator, I will say that I meant it was a mere bagatelle compared with the amounts we are expending.

Mr. BACON. I was endeavoring to say that very thing, but I could not say it so well as the Senator from Colorado. I was endeavoring to express that very idea. As I said, it is comparatively a small amount; but, at the same time, unless we owe it it ought not to be paid.

I am quite sure in my own mind that at least a part of these gunboats, or what are now termed gunboats, are of the class named by the Senator from Maine; that there were purchased from private parties a number of small boats, which had been converted into gunboats, which are used there in the shallow waters, and anybody who goes there can see them; but at the same time I do think that there is a lack of definite information with which the Senate ought to be furnished as to that being the case; and the designations of some of these boats would indicate that they are not of the class. I call the attention of the Senator to the statement on page 3 of the report, contained in the letter of Commander Stuart, in which he enumerates them. He says:

> We, however, have official information, furnished from the office of the military governor, which states that these thirteen vessels were purchased by Lieut. Col. F. W. Pope, chief quartermaster, United States Army, at a cost of $315,000, Mexican currency. The letter from the governor-general's office also informs the board that the armed transport—

The term "armed transport" does not refer to a private boat—

> General Alava and the gunboats Quiros and Villalobos were purchased by Maj. C. P. Miller, United States Army, on February 21, 1900, at a cost of $215,000, Mexican currency, and were immediately turned over to the Navy.

All I want, Mr. President, is to have definite information. If it be true that these boats were purchased, as the Senator says he believes they were, I am prepared to vote for the amendment; but I do think that we ought to have definite information. There is no reason why we should not have it. I do not know whether this bill is to be concluded to-day or not; if not, I presume we can have the information by to-morrow morning. No one wishes to interpose any factious opposition to the item, if it is a proper item; but if it is not a proper item, we ought not to be called upon to vote upon it, even if we are uncertain. I rose for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Maine, without the slightest disposition to interfere with the adoption of this amendment, if it is proper, that in case the bill shall go over until to-morrow we will have this additional information. I presume it can be had; and if not, I think this item may just as well be put on some other appropriation bill.

It is not a fact—and I am sure the Senator upon investigation will find that my statement is correct—that the insular government is now in need of funds. I have no doubt they will need funds; but I have it myself from Governor Taft that they now have $5,000,000 surplus.

I will say to the Senator that nobody will be more prompt to vote in favor of this amendment than I will just as soon as he is prepared to stand in his place and say he has investigated the matter, that these boats were of the class named by him, and have since been converted into gunboats.

Mr. HALE. The Navy Department has this matter now in charge and the Senator has all the information before him. The letters have been read and reread. Speaking for myself, I can give no further information than what we all have in relation to the point which the Senator makes. If the Senator thinks that the question of whether these were originally gunboats is important enough to strike out the item, I am willing it shall go out.

Mr. BACON. No; I do not think that.

Mr. HALE. I want to conclude the bill to-night. It is very essential that we should do so.

Mr. BACON. I do not think the item ought to be stricken out, nor do I wish to vote for its rejection, but I think it is possible that it might be, in view of the uncertainty of it, a proper thing that it should at least be held in abeyance until we can have definite information.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, in order that we may have the benefit of his judgment in the matter, how does he account for the designation "armed transport General Alava?" We have no transport of that name, and we have no transport or no boat which has been converted into an armed transport called the General Alava. How does the Senator account for its designation as "the armed transport General Alava" unless it was a Spanish armed transport? If it was a Spanish armed transport, nobody had a right to sell it to the United States Government.

Mr. HALE. It may have belonged to some old Spanish citizen. I do not know about that.

Mr. BACON. No Spanish citizen could have possession of an armed transport.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me to make a suggestion. I will state what occurred to my mind in connection with that language, and that was that in this letter Commander Stuart, who, I believe, writes it, was describing the boat as it is now. It is now in our ownership as an armed transport.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. He makes that clear, if the Senator will bear with me a moment, because he says in another part of his letter that he has been unable to get information as to the condition of these boats at the time when they were purchased. So that necessarily he is speaking of the present condition of the boat, which is now an armed transport.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from Ohio speak from definite knowledge when he says the United States Government now has an armed transport known as the General Alava?

Mr. FORAKER. I speak from no knowledge except that given here, that that is the name of it. This report shows that the armed transport General Alava is now a part of the United States Navy.

Mr. BACON. We at least can get definite information on that subject.

Mr. HALE. I can tell the Senator that the Government has armed transports.

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. HALE. They call a transport "armed" when they put a single gun on it.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. They go about transporting troops and stores and supplies from one island to another, and they are all armed.

Mr. BACON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HALE. Whether this was a private boat and purchased by us the letter shows, but whether a gun was put on it after we bought it or whether the Spanish Government had put a gun on it, makes no difference. It does not seem to me that it is really essential to know whether this transport was armed at one time or another.

Mr. BACON. That is not the question at all.

Mr. HALE. I thought it was.

Mr. BACON. That is not the question; but I submit this to the Senator. He says that the information can not be gotten. The information can be gotten at the Quartermaster-General's Office in this city whether the United States Government has an armed transport named the General Alava or not. If it has not, then the designation of it as an armed transport must refer to its having been an armed transport in the service of the Spanish Government. I submit to the Senator in all candor——

Mr. HALE. I do not accept that conclusion.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it is made perfectly clear, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me to interrupt him a moment——

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. From the document before us it appears that the armed transport General Alava is now in our ownership, possession, and use under that name. In the letter of Commander Stuart to which I referred a moment ago, found on page 3, dated at Manila July 22, 1901, occurs this paragraph:

> In reply to a letter addressed to the senior squadron commander and referred by him to the commandant of the naval station, Cavite, the board is informed that the date of receipt of these vessels is not known, nor is it known from whom they were received, nor their condition at the time they were turned over to the naval authorities.

Necessarily, therefore, if he did not know what the condition was when it was received, he could not have been describing it when he referred to it later as "an armed transport" as having been an armed transport at that time. He does not know what it was then. He speaks of it as it exists now. In a subsequent part of his letter and report he speaks of that boat in connection with other boats as a part now of the American Navy, and this particular boat is described as "the armed transport General Alava." In the report made by the appraisal board, consisting of three naval officers, they say they have carefully investigated all the records on the subject, being satisfied that all these boats were purchased, although from whom and at just what time they are unable to state. While they do not know what their condition was at the time they were actually received, they report that the amounts so far paid out of this insular fund are fair compensation.

Mr. BACON. The statement of the officers as to the uncertainty of the condition of the boats when they were received evidently refers to the question of the condition of repair, and has no reference whatever to their character prior to that time.

I repeat, Mr. President—I think it is a repetition; I am not sure, but I want to be certain about it—that so far as these boats have been legitimately purchased by the insular funds, and where the boats have been turned over to the United States Government, the United States Government ought to refund the amount. I hope I am not misunderstood on that subject. The sole doubt in my mind as to whether we should now pass upon it is the doubt which apparently arises from the face of this record, as to what was the nature and character of those boats prior to the purchase. If they were Spanish boats, then the person who sold them had no right to sell them. It seems that some of them at least were Spanish boats. I suppose we can ascertain that by a simple inquiry at the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to my friends on the other side that there ought to be somewhere a means of getting at the facts in this matter; that is, there should be a report from the War Department or from the Taft Commission as to the expenditure of the funds which they have collected, and which they designate as insular funds. A large item like this of a half million dollars, or something like that, must appear in that document, or report, or whatever it is. I do not know where to put my hand on such a thing; but I think it is obligatory upon Senators on the other side to satisfy us on this subject. Of course, if they do not choose to do so they have the majority and can go along. We can only call attention to these little loosenesses, so to speak, and the inability to have our books kept over there in the way they ought to be kept.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think there is any question but what the insular government had these boats. Commander Stuart says, on page 3:

> We, however, have official information, furnished from the office of the military governor, which states that these thirteen vessels were purchased by Lieut. Col. F. W. Pope, chief quartermaster, United States Army, at a cost of $315,000 Mexican currency. The letter from the governor-general's office also informs the board that the armed transport General Alava and the gunboats Quiros and Villalobos were purchased by Maj. C. P. Miller, United States Army, on February 21, 1900, at a cost of $215,000 Mexican currency.

The Secretary of the Navy says——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. To supplement what the Senator is saying, if he will turn to page 4, he will find there:

> In making this recommendation the board would state that the information furnished is incomplete, and the amount of reimbursement recommended—

The information is incomplete, and the amount of reimbursement recommended, they say—> is the actual amount paid for the vessels, as shown by the records furnished by the office of the military governor.

Mr. TELLER. That is shown in Commander Stuart's statement.

Mr. SPOONER. And also in the report of the Naval Examining Board.

Mr. TELLER. The Secretary of the Navy says:

> As shown by said reports, the value of the property in question, as nearly as could be ascertained, is equal to $450,042.40 Mexican currency, and as the vessels and the ordnance are indispensable to the efficient operations of the Navy in the Philippine Islands, the Secretary of War has consented to the retention of said property by this Department.

That is a declaration that our Government has got the property. Now, what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] wants to know distinctly is, whether these vessels were sold and whether the insular government had the right to sell them or not; whether they were boats formerly belonging to the Spanish Government, or whether they belonged to individuals. I suppose we might, perhaps, assume that they belonged to individuals, or else the insular government would not have bought them. I do not think there is very much question but that the Spanish Government formerly owned these boats. Now, we have got them and we are paying, as I understand, all the expenses of the war, which do not come out of the insular people at all.

Mr. BACON. I think it is a mistake to suppose that gunboats were purchased by the insular government.

Mr. TELLER. They were purchased by the insular government. The insular government was simply the military government there. They were purchased by the military government, and that was the insular government, as I understand. I may be mistaken, but I think that is the fact.

Mr. BACON. My understanding is that the military government was the insular government, which had certain funds, doubtless derived from revenues collected there, and that the officers of the Army possibly, not having themselves the money to buy these boats, got the money for that purpose from the insular government—the military government.

Mr. TELLER. I think they were probably purchased for the use of the insular government, expecting that that government would use them; that is, the military government would use them for their purposes, and that they were paid for with these funds. I admit that there is a degree of looseness about this entire business that is not very satisfactory; but that will be the case in all these accounts that come to us. I do not know how we are going to revise them so as to know what we ought to pay. We are carrying on a war that is a great charge upon us. The Navy is a charge upon us, and everything of that kind, and all that the insular government or the present civil government collect from revenues they expend not, I suppose, for what might be called war purposes—not for the Navy, not for the Army—but for the protection of themselves, for their own salaries, for internal improvements, and various other things. We do not have any control over them; nobody is looking very closely to see whether they are spending that money as they ought to spend it under supervision on our part. If they are very loose in that regard, I guess they will be pretty loose in other regards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, after line 21, the Committee on Appropriations report an amendment to insert the following:

> For the reimbursement of the Philippine insular funds for small gunboats and other craft, ordnance and ordnance stores, turned over by the military authorities at Manila to the Navy, a sum of money equal to $450,042.40, Mexican currency, at the valuation thereof during the first quarter of the calendar year 1900, $208,819.67, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. There is an amendment on page 42 which has not been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, after the word "Grounds," in line 3, the Committee on Appropriations report an amendment to insert:

And the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall hereafter exercise all the power and authority heretofore exercised by the Architect of the Capitol, and he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to that amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations the following:

Provided, That no change in the architectural features of the Capitol building or in the landscape features of the Capitol grounds shall be made except on plans to be approved by the Committee on Rules of both houses.

Mr. HALE. That is a good amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee accepts the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make a suggestion to my colleague. It seems to me that a change of the architectural features of this building, with its superb architecture, having primacy among all the legislative buildings of the world for beauty, should not be under the control of a legislative committee. I know something of the functions of the Library Committee. I was the senior member of that committee for a good many years. I acted as chairman when the term of the chairman expired, or when the chairman was absent, and practically held the chairmanship for a long while. I know how difficult it is to get every member of that committee together to consult in the summer, when these things are likely to be done. I should like my colleague to consider the question whether the Committee on the Library is the best body for the consideration of such a subject.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment proposes to refer such questions to the Committees on Rules. The Committees on Rules of the two Houses are the committees always in charge of the Capitol building.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the amendment being amended by providing—I do not know its language—that no distinctive change shall be made in the architecture of the Capitol building or the landscape features of the grounds until further ordered by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. HALE. I should have no objection to such an amendment as that.

Mr. LODGE. "Without the approval of Congress?"

Mr. HALE. Yes. I would strike out the reference to the Committees on Rules and say "without the approval of Congress." I think that is right.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I will modify my amendment in that way.

Mr. HALE. There will then be no danger of such changes being made, and we do not any of us want them made.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to have the amendment to the amendment again stated.

Mr. HALE. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the committee amendment the following:

Provided, That no change in the architectural features of the Capitol building or in the landscape features of the Capitol grounds shall be made except upon plans to be approved by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the only item that is left is the amendment on page 44.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to this amendment, I believe it was passed over while I was out. It is proposed by the Senate committee to strike out the following clause:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, and the land office of said district will be continued at Sitka. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued such business shall be transferred to the Sitka office.

Now, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are at this time five offices, I believe, in Alaska. The provision in the bill as it came from the House on this subject is proposed to be stricken out. I hold in my hand the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office, showing the receipts and expenditures of these five offices. At Sitka we took in $6,467.76 and spent $13,585.93; at the Rampart office we took in $10 and spent $4,249.60; at St. Michael we took in nothing and spent $2,533.33; at Circle City the expenditures were $5,587.41, with no receipts; at Peavy the expenditures were $7,153.12, with no receipts, and at Weare the expenditures were $1,868.30, with no receipts.

The Commissioner says:

With rent charges of $600 per annum at both St. Michael and Rampart, with wood at $15 per cord and coal at from $40 to $75 per ton at St. Michael, with wood at $20 per cord and coal too expensive for fuel at Rampart, some idea can be obtained as to the cost of incidentals at these offices.

Again, he says:

A recapitulation of the above facts shows that while the various offices heretofore maintained in the valley of the Yukon and its tributaries for the accommodation and encouragement of miners have within the short period of time mentioned in each case cost $21,391.76, there has been but one single application filed in any of these offices with a fee of $10.

The Commissioner of the Land Office recommended that these offices be discontinued. The House carried out the recommendation of the Commissioner, and my understanding is that the Senate committee propose to strike out that feature of the bill.

Mr. HALE. The committee had all of this information. It is undoubtedly the fact that in all these districts the business has been very small, in some of them ridiculously so. The office at Sitka costs $7,000 beyond what the Government received, and Sitka is from nine to ten or eleven hundred miles away from that portion of Alaska where all the business is now done. A question arose in the minds of the committee as to why Sitka was selected as the one particular office, when everything had departed from it. Then we looked at the law. The law, section 12 of the act, declares that the President is authorized and empowered in his discretion by executive order at any time to arrange or combine or discontinue land offices in Alaska. We sent to the Interior Department, which has charge of all land offices, and the Secretary sent us a letter. As the law stands it authorizes the President to consolidate the offices and put the office at the proper place. The committee doubted whether Sitka was the proper place, but believed fully that the offices should be consolidated. We received this letter only a few days ago:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 30, 1902.

SIR: Referring to your personal inquiry in respect to the provisions in the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 9315) as it passed the House of Representatives, which consolidates into one land district the several existing land districts in Alaska, I beg to say that, while heretofore there has been some doubt as to whether the President was authorized by existing legislation to consolidate these several districts into one, I have, on full consideration of the several statutes upon the subject (Rev. Stat., secs. 2249, 2254; act of August 15, 1892, 27 Stat., 368; sec. 12, act of May 14, 1898, 30 Stat., 414), reached the opinion that the President is clearly authorized by existing legislation to make such changes in these districts as he deems advisable, and to designate the place for the land office in the consolidated district, if the districts be consolidated into one district. Unless Congress desires to make some specific disposition of the matter, existing legislation is such that the provision which is now carried in the urgent deficiency bill is unnecessary.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Therefore not knowing, and it seeming doubtful whether we should consolidate these offices into one district and locate the office in a place whence all the business had departed, we reported this amendment. Sitka is of no account now in Alaska. It is 1,100 miles away from the business and all that is done, and therefore the committee, in order to throw it into conference and get other information as may be necessary, propose to strike it out, there being authority on the part of the President to consolidate. I think we ought to consolidate the offices. I doubt very much whether we ought to locate the office at Sitka.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Maine speaks about Sitka being an inconvenient location. Is not the President authorized under the law at this time to locate the office at such place as he desires?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; but if the House provision passes, he will not have that authority. That is the very point.

Mr. CLAY. Is it not true that an amendment would cure that very easily by simply authorizing the President to locate the office that may be left at such place as may be convenient to the people of Alaska?

Mr. HALE. He has that authority now. That is why the committee took that action. The President has that authority.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg to say that, under this amendment as it came from the House, the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior will have ample power to do just as they can do now.

Mr. HALE. I do not know about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question on that point.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that these five offices cost

$21,000 per annum during the last five or six years, and the receipts I have read. Here are two reports from the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending that Congress take hold of this matter and abolish these offices and simply leave one there.

Mr. HALE. Let me read the language of the House provision and see if the President would have any power under it. I hope the Senator from Missouri will follow the reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have read it time and again.

Mr. HALE. It provides:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, and the land office of said district will be continued at Sitka. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued, such business shall be transferred to the Sitka office.

The President can not locate the office at any place except Sitka.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest a reason why the office should go to Sitka, coming from the Commissioner of the General Land Office himself? If he will look at the report of that gentleman, page 59, he will find that after making the statement which the Senator from Georgia has quoted and pointing out all the facts that have been used here he goes on to argue the case; and I will condense his argument by saying that he states that the reason why he recommends the location of the office at Sitka is because that is the only place where lands are taken for agricultural uses. He says all these other claims, on the Yukon and at Nome and everywhere else, are mining claims and that it costs too much money for the miners to patent those claims, and they hold them and mine out the minerals and then abandon them, but that wherever agriculture exists, to however limited a degree, the people who want to use the land buy it and get it patented.

Of course if the conferees on the part of the House insist that this clause shall remain in, I presume the Senate committee will trade off some of the other items and let the House have its way. I have noticed that that system sometimes obtains. We have just given $208,000, I think it is, of our money to these insular possessions. I think the only danger is that some of these lovely officers of ours, these sweet-scented characters whom we have been discussing this morning, may continue to hold their jobs in Alaska by reason of the strong pull their friends have at headquarters. I take it that in the interest of economy the House had better have its way. But then the Senate is a liberal body, and I simply throw that out as a reason why the office should go to Sitka.

Mr. HALE. I know nothing whatever except what is in these documents, and the committee thought, under the circumstances——

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, the majority of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I mean the majority of the committee. After examining the letter from the Secretary and examining law, and believing that the President had this authority, the committee thought it was safer to throw the provision out and let the matter go into conference. But it is a matter entirely within the power of the Senate. I do not propose to take up any more time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the amendment of the Senate committee will not be agreed to. I think it is morally and legally wrong.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if we should adopt the House provision, I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that the President would have the right to move the office away from Sitka. Under the existing law, the general statute, he can do it; he can do it by the Alaska statute; but if we put in a special provision that he shall locate the office at Sitka, there it must be located. We can avoid that difficulty by saying "the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one," and stop at that, and not say that the land office shall be continued at Sitka.

It will not be a great while before there will be a demand to enter placer claims at Nome and other places. The Secretary of the Interior evidently has not been out in the mining country much, and he is excusing the fact that there are no efforts made to patent claims. Under the existing laws a man holds possession, with as good title for the purpose of working a claim as if he had a patent, but when anybody assails his title he has to go back and show the inception of his title. He has to show that he took it at a certain time, that he has continually worked it within the provisions of the law, and all that, but if, upon the other hand, he has a patent, he is relieved from all that, and all he does, if anybody assails his title, is what a man does who has a patent—walk into court and show his patent. No man can take a claim until he has expended $500 on it, and he can take a patent provided he pays for it according to the provisions of law.

There is a land office at Sitka. There are two or three other land offices which are not needed, as everybody knows, and if we want to reduce it to one, I think we ought to reduce it without naming the place where the one office shall be located.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he move such an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I will in a moment. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] suggests that the reason why they want the office at Sitka is because it is where the land is entered. Here is rather a significant statement made by the Commissioner:

Not only has there been but one application under the mineral laws in all the offices of northern Alaska—

That is the only place.

But there has never been an application of any kind under any of the other public-land laws extended to Alaska.

Now, there has not been any application to enter land at Sitka at all, nor at any other place, except, probably, at St. Michael.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes; there has been business at Sitka. The receipts were $6,000 or $7,000. There had to be business in order to be receipts.

Mr. TELLER. This is what the report says.

Mr. COCKRELL. That means in the northern offices.

Mr. TELLER. It says:

Not only has there been but one application under the mineral laws in all the offices of northern Alaska——

Mr. COCKRELL. Northern Alaska; not Sitka.

Mr. TELLER—

But there has never been an application of any kind under any of the other public-land laws extended to Alaska.

Probably it does not mean at Sitka; but if the Department thinks Sitka is the place at which to keep the office, it can keep it there. If later it thinks another one should be established somewhere else, it will have to take it away from Sitka.

This leaves it absolutely within the control of the Executive, and while it does seem somewhat scandalous to think that we have thus paid out twenty-odd thousand dollars, and fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars of it at least where nothing has been done, yet there may come a time when we will need land offices at some of these places.

I rather dislike to see the executive department tied up, so that if they find they need another office up there they can not provide for it. I think the attention of the Executive being called to it, he may conclude that these offices shall be so arranged as to do the business and at the same time not make so great a draft on the Government. I have been informed that very recently we have confirmed some officers for these land offices, which have been in operation for a couple of years and where they have not done any business at all. I think, perhaps, on looking at the statement here, that the Commissioner is speaking of northern Alaska or the section of country beyond Sitka.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is it. There is no question about it.

Mr. TELLER. Sitka is not in Alaska, as we talk about Alaska. It is not in that section of Alaska which produces the gold that is coming out. I do not know, and perhaps some Senator will tell me, just how far it is. I think it is more than a thousand miles from Sitka.

Mr. HALE. Nearly 2,000.

Mr. TELLER. And it is very difficult to get back and forth. I think myself we had better leave the whole matter to the Administration, with a little admonition here that if the office is not needed they had better abandon it, as they can do under the law. That is not only the law as to Alaska, but it has been for thirty years the law of the land that the President of the United States can close any land office that he wants, move it to another place, consolidate two offices, create a new office whenever he wants to, close it whenever in his judgment it is necessary that it should be closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to, and that this clause will be left in the bill, with an amendment, if the Senator from Colorado wants it.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to move it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator let me offer it now?

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator from Missouri think it is necessary?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; but it will not hurt anything.

Mr. CLAY. It will not hurt anything, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out after the word "one," in line 12, down to and including the word "Sitka," in line 13, and then, in line 16, to strike out "the Sitka" and insert "such."

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the clause so as to read as follows:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one. If at the time of the taking effect of this act there should be any business pending in any of the offices to be discontinued, such business shall be transferred to such office.

Mr. TELLER. That will put it in conference just the same as if we struck it out.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, this question is peculiar to all new countries. I recall that in the Territory of Dakota, when land offices were first established there, years elapsed before any business was done to amount to anything. They were a perpetual expense to the Government, and it is so now in all new parts of the country. It was so in Oklahoma for quite a while. Now Oklahoma is paying a hundredfold over the expenses in point of receipts.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a little different climate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. You can not regulate climate by legislation, however. The Senator from South Carolina may do it, but the ordinary Senator can not.

There is on file in the Public Lands Committee to-day a very strong petition, with several letters from residents at Juneau, who are up in arms against the proposed consolidation of all these land offices and the location of a single office at Sitka. There is already a local rivalry in that section and great contention between the two towns, which are not very far apart, as Senators all know. Juneau and Sitka are in the southeastern part of Alaska, more than 1,500 miles, perhaps 2,000 miles, away from the business part of Alaska, so eloquently referred to to-day.

I think, having some knowledge of the land situation in that country, that if you are going to make this change, there should be one land office in the northern part of Alaska, and of course there ought to be one in southeastern Alaska.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion right here. I suggest that the Senator from Colorado change his amendment and provide that the number of offices shall be reduced to two, and then leave it to the President. That will cover the point the Senator from North Dakota makes that there ought to be one office in the upper part of Alaska as well as one below.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not agree to that.

Mr. TELLER. I would rather do that and leave it to the judgment of the President.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am sure, judging by the past, that the President will do nothing, and the Secretary of the Interior will not do it. That is the reason why I am going to object to it. I am not going to mince any words about it. I have a right to criticise any Executive Administration when they do not carry out the law in the interest of the people and in the interest of economy.

Mr. HALE. If we cut it down to two, the President will be obliged to do it. To whatever number we cut it down, he will be obliged to reduce the number of offices.

Mr. COCKRELL. We will cut it down to one. That is the thing to do now. Let us stop this thing. I appreciate the kindness of the Senator from North Dakota, but I will show here right now—and I can do it—that there is no possibility of a change being made unless Congress does it.

Mr. HALE. We propose to do it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read a telegram received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to-day:

In reply to your telegram this date, registers and receivers of Alaska land offices, with dates of appointments, are as follows: Sitka, Albert J. Apperson, receiver, December 19, 1899; John W. Dudley, register, January 19, 1899. St. Michael, Albert E. Rose, receiver, January 19, 1899.

Notwithstanding this report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that this office cost $21,000 and did not produce a cent.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Oh, no. The Senator does not want to be wrong about it. It is not this one office.

Mr. COCKRELL. This office, with the others.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The entire outfit of offices in Alaska.

Mr. COCKRELL. All the offices except the Sitka office.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Precisely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read the next one:

Franklin Moses, register, February 4, 1901; Rampart City, William R. Edwards, receiver, May 26, 1900; Patrick M. Mullen, register, December 18, 1901.

Confirmed by the Senate at this session.

Mr. TELLER. At which place?

Mr. COCKRELL. Rampart. So we have officers now at three offices.

Mr. TELLER. How much business was done at that office?

Mr. CLAY. The receipts were $10 and the expenditures were $4,249.60.

Mr. COCKRELL. And no receipts at all at St. Michael.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply repeat——

Mr. COCKRELL. Permit me just a moment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. What the Commissioner of the General Land Office says is in his report directed to the Secretary of the Interior and dated August 31, 1901. I call the attention of the Senator to this, because there is no politics in this. Here is your own Commissioner and your own Secretary of the Interior making the recommendation, and here they lay before you a fact in the face of which you can not justify the continuance of these offices. He quotes the law, and after giving a good deal of what has already been said, he says:

It is worthy of consideration how far we are justified in continuing these expensive offices with no business thus far demanding their continuance. The promises and expectations which prompted their creation are not fulfilled by subsequent experience, and the wisdom of their further continuance is doubtful in the extreme.

It will be observed that the offices at Nulato, Weare, Rampart, and Circle are all located upon or near the Yukon River, while the office of Peavy was on a prominent tributary of that river; and since these offices were established and maintained almost entirely for the sole purpose of accommodating the miners, their lack of patronage seems to demonstrate that their further continuance is unnecessary.

After carefully considering all the facts, and estimating future probabilities—

And they have as good opportunities of estimating future possibilities as any one of us has—

it is believed that both the Yukon and the Circle districts should be abolished, their territory added to the Sitka district, and their offices consolidated with the Sitka office, at least for the present, and until such time as there shall appear some real necessity for an office in the Yukon country.

Now, this letter, which was written to the Senator from North Dakota by the Secretary of the Interior on the 30th day of January, after this trouble came up, would seem to create the impression that before that time they had had a doubt in their minds about the right and power to consolidate these offices.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. Read that. I will read it.

Mr. TELLER. I only meant to say the law is so plain——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not speaking of the law. I am speaking of what is in the mind of the executive branch of the Government. We are dealing with that now. The Secretary of the Interior says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 30, 1902.

SIR: Referring to your personal inquiry in respect to the provisions in the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 9315), as it passed the House of Representatives, which consolidates into one land district the several existing land districts in Alaska, I beg to say that, while heretofore there has been some doubt as to whether the President was authorized by existing legislation to consolidate the several districts into one—

Now, what does the Senator say?

Mr. TELLER. Who writes that?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Secretary of the Interior. It was written to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] under date of January 30, 1902.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I think it must be assumed here that some clerk wrote that letter.

Mr. COCKRELL. That I do not know. It has the printed signature of the Secretary attached to it. The letter continues:

I have, on full consideration of the several statutes upon the subject (Rev. Stats., secs. 2249, 2254; act of August 15, 1892, 27 Stat., 368; sec. 12, act of May 14, 1898, 30 Stat., 414), reached the opinion that the President is clearly authorized by existing legislation to make such changes in these districts as he deems advisable, and to designate the place for the land office in the consolidated district, if the districts be consolidated into one district. Unless Congress desires to make some specific disposition of the matter, existing legislation is such that the provision which is now carried in the urgent deficiency bill is unnecessary.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

Hon. H. C. HANSBROUGH,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will permit me, that can only mean that it was done without an examination of the law and the power of the President has not been understood. There is no doubt of what the Senator from Colorado says. The act here is very plain. Let me read it again:

That the President is authorized and empowered, in his discretion, by Executive order, from time to time to establish or discontinue land districts in the district of Alaska, and to define, modify, or change the boundaries thereof and designate or change the location of any land offices therein.

That is just as complete as can be.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it.

Mr. HALE. There is no question whatever about it. All that letter means is that the attention of the Secretary had not been drawn to the law.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us see. I am sorry the Senator said that. It compels me to refer to something that I did not care about criticising.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not now.

Mr. TELLER. Right on that point.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me read what the Commissioner of the General Land Office said and what the President, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner between them have done. Let us look at it and see whether they understood the law or not:

Under section 12 of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stats., 414), quoted above, the Peavy land district was created by Executive order of February 14, 1899, from the northern portions of the Yukon and Circle districts, and the land office established at Peavy, on the Kayukuk River, north of the Arctic Circle. The office of Peavy being difficult of access, owing to the late opening and early closing of navigation in that northern region, and its location not having stimulated discoveries in that locality, the further maintenance of the Peavy district was deemed inadvisable, and, accordingly, by Executive order of February 24, 1900, the Peavy district was abolished and its territory consolidated with the Yukon and Circle districts, whose common boundary line was also changed.

Mr. TELLER. Where does the Senator find that?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, dated, as I have quoted before, in August, and the report of the Secretary of the Interior quotes from this report.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to make provision for every officer that is necessary in the Government, but I am not willing to consent that this Senate shall stultify itself by voting here thousands of dollars to men who have not done one particle of work for the benefit of the Government, who hold mere sinecures which they have had the power and influence to prevent being taken away from them by Executive order.

Mr. HALE. Now, I do not object to that, Mr. President. My only question is that in doing this we do not go so far as to do any injustice and deprive a portion of the Territory there of a land office that it ought to have.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no. Under the amendment which has been agreed to, the President will have all the power that he now possesses. He can to-morrow reestablish these offices if he wants to do so. There is ample provision there.

Mr. HALE. I presume not.

Mr. TELLER. He can create only one office in the Territory. That might be at Sitka or it might be at St. Michael.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am perfectly willing to give him the power to create another office whenever it is necessary. Nobody wants to impose any hardship upon those people there; but we have the statement before us from our own executive officers that here have been $21,000 drawn and not one particle of labor returned for it, and we have it that the Department have modified these offices and changed them because there was no business, and yet they have not the power to make the changes which they recommend here and they have not done it. Since these recommendations have been made by both the Secretary and the Commissioner of of the General Land Office—for I have the Secretary's report here—officers have been appointed for these two offices and we have confirmed them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Those were reappointments. They were appointed a year ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. That shows that they had power to keep themselves in, and they will keep themselves in unless this office is abolished. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HALE. Let me see if this amendment will cover it. We all agree it is a scandal that this should be going on, so much money spent and no business done. We do not want that. Instead of the House provision I suggest that we provide as follows:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, the location of which shall be fixed by the President, and the President shall not hereafter establish any other land office in Alaska unless, in his judgment, the necessities of the service require it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am perfectly willing for that. I do not want to limit and restrict, but when the executive authority gets so that it can not act, I want to release it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. TELLER. I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to make a suggetion to the Senator from Maine. That rather carries the implication that some President might be willing to establish a land office in Alaska when, in his judgment, the public interest did not require it. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be better to say, "That the President shall have authority to establish an additional land office in Alaska whenever"——

Mr. HALE. "Whenever the same may be necessary."

Mr. SPOONER. "Whenever, in his judgment, the public interest may require."

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right. I have no objection to that amendment. Let it be read at the desk.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read for information the amendment proposed in lieu of the pending amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Read the clause as it will stand when amended. Then we will understand it.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the House clause and substitute for it the entire clause: "The number of land offices, etc., is hereby reduced to one."

Mr. TELLER. Let us see what will be substituted for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, instead of the committee's amendment, the following:

That the number of land offices and land districts in the district of Alaska is hereby reduced to one, the location of which shall be established by the President, and the President shall not hereafter establish any other land offices in Alaska unless, in his judgment, the necessities of the service require it.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest in place of the last clause, if agreeable to the Senator, this language:

And the President may establish an additional land office and land district in Alaska when, in his judgment, the public interest shall require it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine accept the amendment?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I think it is better than my amendment.

Mr. TELLER. The Revised Statutes, which have been in force for many years, contain the following provision:

Whenever the cost of collecting the revenue from the sale of public lands in any land district is as much as one-third of the whole amount of revenue collected in such district, it may be lawful for the President, if in his opinion not incompatible with public interests, to discontinue the land office in such district and to annex the same to some other adjoining land district.

The act of August 5, 1892, contains this provision:

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to consolidate the land-district offices where practicable and consistent with public interests.

The suggestion made in that letter that it has been a doubtful question in the Department is certainly an oversight on the part of the officer who signed it, because they have been consolidating, closing, and making new offices, to my certain knowledge, in the West, under this general authority, for at least twenty-five or thirty years.

Mr. HALE. There is no doubt about the fact, and has not been.

Mr. TELLER. I did not mean to reflect on the Secretary of the Interior. I suppose it went to some clerk, and some clerk wrote it, and the Secretary signed it without paying any attention to it.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that is the explanation. Now let the amendment be adopted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, just a word. I simply want to call attention to the fact that under the provision of this amendment when the President reduces the land offices to one in Alaska he must either place it at Sitka or Juneau, in southeastern Alaska, or in northern Alaska away up near Siberia, fully 2,000 miles away from Sitka. Now, if he places it at Sitka it will require a trip from the northern part of Alaska to get to Sitka, which is out of the way. It is far easier to get from Siberia to San Francisco to-day than from St. Michael to Sitka. On the other hand, if he locates the land office at St. Michael and abandons the office at Sitka the people in southeastern Alaska will be placed under equal hardships. So I think in all fairness there should be at least two land offices in Alaska.

Mr. SPOONER. This amendment authorizes it.

Mr. HALE. This amendment meets the case.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The amendment, as I understand it, calls for one.

Mr. HALE. No; the amendment transfers the discretion to the President in meeting the situation described by the Senator from North Dakota. If he finds trouble and difficulty in establishing only one office in southern Alaska or in northern Alaska, it gives him the opportunity to establish another, making two in all. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the President will proceed to establish it right away if he can do it under the authority of this amendment.

Mr. HALE. That is the very purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I believe that concludes the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I desire to recur once more to the amendment that was passed yesterday in regard to the claims of the States upon the General Government. I should like to submit an amendment to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator his amendment drawn?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I propose to amend on page 69, line 23, after the word "fifteen," in italics, by inserting the words "not heretofore allowed or;" so that it will read:

Eighteen hundred and sixty-two (Twelfth Statutes, p. 615), not heretofore allowed or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF MORNING HOUR TO-MORROW.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LODGE. Before that motion is put, I wish the Senator would yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I desire merely to give notice that I shall move to proceed with the consideration of the Philippine bill immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice given by the junior Senator from Massachusetts will be noted in the RECORD.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In reference to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, I wish to state that to-morrow morning after the routine business it was my intention to address the Senate on the question of irrigation for thirty or, perhaps, forty minutes.

Mr. LODGE. We can arrange that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator will accommodate himself to that suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I think I can arrange that to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 6, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following bill (H. R. 10847) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes; and I desire to serve notice that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow I will ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order on the bill. The bill will be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

OLEOMARGARINE BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill 9206, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be closed to-day, and that the bill be taken up to-morrow under the five-minute rule, and a vote taken on the bill and amendments at 4 o'clock. I might say in explanation that this is the arrangement that has been acceded to by the chairman of the committee, Mr. WADSWORTH.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 9206, and pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that all general debate be closed on the bill to-day at 5 o'clock, and that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow it be considered under the five-minute rule, and a vote on the bill be taken to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill 9206, and that general debate be closed to-day at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill 9206, and pending that, moves that all general debate be closed on the bill at 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. And on that I ask for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I believe I have a right to be heard on that anyway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to be heard on the motion for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask that the gentleman from Connecticut withhold his motion for the previous question that I may be heard for five minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I withhold that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I am not a parliamentary sharp, and I am sometimes very thankful that I am not. I had a general impression that one had a right to discuss a motion for the previous question ten minutes on a side; but, Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to the House against this motion. I feel very much as if I was making a vain and ineffectual appeal, and I do not desire to act the part of an obstructionist or of a filibusterer. That is a thing I never do, except when I consider fundamental constitutional principles at stake.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the minority members of the committee, who have brought in a report against this bill, had no knowledge until yesterday evening, when they were informed of it, that this motion was to be made, and even they—the members of the committee—have not had an opportunity to be heard. The gentleman from New York opened in four or five minutes and reserved the balance of his time, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLEN], a member of the committee, who desires to be heard in opposition, has thus far had no opportunity, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], also a member of the committee, has had no opportunity to be heard.

As for myself I am willing to waive my right to be heard in order that friends with less opportunities may have a chance to be heard. Had I been told yesterday morning (and the making of the list on our side was left to me) that the time was going to be cut short, I could have reduced each man's allotment so as to permit all who desired to be heard to come in.

I hope the House will, in the interest of fairness, vote down this proposition. And if that should be done, I propose then to agree to a motion, or I will make the motion myself, that if you give us two days of general debate and one day under the five-minute rule we will come to a vote.

What object can there be in refusing us this additional one day? If the House should be ready to adjourn upon the 7th of June, or the 10th of July, or any other time that may be suggested, the arrangement I now propose will make only this difference, that the adjournment will be one day later than the time proposed. There is no reason connected with this bill itself for not enabling us to thrash this matter out now while it is before the country. This will probably be the last opportunity. Your bill will undoubtedly pass this House. I am afraid it will pass the Senate. But we have a duty resting upon us, and that is to call the attention of the country to the menacing danger of the precedent which you are about to set. I ask that this motion be voted down, and then I will agree that after two days more of general debate and one day under the five-minute rule we shall come to a vote.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion for the previous question. No gentleman can speak except by unanimous consent.

The question being taken upon the motion for the previous question,

The SPEAKER. The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 74.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 51 voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The roll will be called, and members as their names are read will respond. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut to order the previous question on the motion to close debate at 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Pending that, I want to ask unanimous consent of the House that there may be given to the further consideration of this bill two more days of general debate and one under the five minute rule, subject to the possibility of this bill being temporarily displaced by any general appropriation bill which may be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that this day and one day more be devoted to further general debate on the pending bill——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I object.

The SPEAKER. And that there then be one day's debate under the five-minute rule. [A pause.] Does the gentleman from Connecticut object? [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. This order will dispense with the call of the roll.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of House bill 9206, known as the oleomargarine bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LACEY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9206) to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, so much has already been said with regard to the bill pending that I feel I can add very little to the arguments that have been adduced by those who oppose the measure. This bill purports to be a bill to make oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported, and to change the tax on oleomargarine.

The evident purpose of the bill is not to raise revenue. It is conceded by its advocates that we shall not need, in order to administer the Government, the revenue proposed to be collected by the bill. The bill provides that, instead of the taxation of 2 cents a pound that we already have on all oleomargarine, there shall be a tax of 10 cents a pound upon colored oleomargarine and three-fourths of 1 cent per pound on uncolored oleomargarine. The bill does not purport on its face to be a bill to exercise the taxing power in behalf of one industry as against another, but any man may read as he runs and see that the purpose of the bill is to drive out of the markets of the country one legitimate product of our industries in order that a monopoly may be established in behalf of another product.

Mr. Chairman, it has been contended that this bill will be held to be constitutional in its effect because its purpose is not stated in the title. I deny that such will be the construction of the higher court. I deny that the Supreme Court of the United States is limited in the right to pass upon the constitutionality of a bill by the mere expression in its title. Following the decisions that I shall quote, I hold that the court has the power to go behind the express title of the bill, and if it takes judicial notice of the fact that the purpose of the bill is not as expressed, but to deprive a particular industry of its right among the other industries of the country, then, Mr. Chairman, the court has the right to exercise its high function and declare the act unconstitutional. I want to read to the House from some decisions with regard to this question.

In support of my contention, I read the decision of Mr. Justice Harlan in the case Mugler vs. Kansas (123 U. S. Reports, p. 163):

> It belongs to that department (speaking of the legislative department) to exert what are known as the police powers of the State and to determine primarily what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety. It does not at all follow that every statute ostensibly for the promotion of these ends is to be accepted as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State. There are limits beyond which legislation can not rightfully go.

Further on in the same opinion the court says:

> The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon an inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and therefore give effect to the Constitution.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States vs. Collins, 171 United States, says:

> In whatever language a statute may be framed its purpose must be determined by its natural and its reasonable effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, applying that to the bill in question, and knowing the natural and the reasonable effect of this bill evidently is for the purpose of suppressing the manufacture of oleomargarine, I believe it would be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to a provision of this bill that seems to me is the most dangerous feature of the bill. That is the proviso in section 1, which proviso I will now read:

> Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit any State to forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Now, sir, the Constitution provides that, except with the consent of Congress, the States have no right to pass a law that will prohibit the sale or manufacture of an article of interstate commerce or other article that is wholesome in its effect. Is this a wholesome article? Why, Mr. Chairman, the opinions of chemists, of scientists, of men who are in a position to know, have been given, and I want to add to that evidence the expression of the highest court in this country, the Supreme Court of the United States, which in the Shollenbarger case, speaking by Mr. Justice Peckham, said:

> There has not one witness appeared to testify about the wholesomeness or the nutritiousness of this article. There has not a witness appeared to tell us about the constituents of it, but we take judicial notice of the fact that it has been a known article of commerce for a quarter of a century. We take judicial notice of the fact that in all the reports of the chemists and in all reports of the Department of Agriculture, of the States and of the United States, this thing has been probed, and we are bound to say, as the court of last resort and the highest judicial authority of this land, that the stamp of wholesomeness and of nutritiousness is on this article, and it is a fit subject of commerce.

So we have not only the evidence of the scientists, not only the evidence of the manufacturers, but the conclusions, the judicial notice of the Supreme Court of the United States, that this article is a wholesome article and can not be interfered with, and the court in construing this act must take judicial notice of these facts and conclusions.

What is the object of this provision? It means by implication that the States may forbid the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine that contains an ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

What does that mean, Mr. Chairman? It means this: It is admitted and conceded that milk, cream, and butter are constituent articles in the production of oleomargarine. It means, if that contention is right, that any ingredient tending to color this butter can be eliminated. It means that the Congress delegates to the State, or gives consent that the State may enact a law which will deprive the farmers of this country—the milkmen of this country—selling to the oleomargarine factories an ingredient that enters into the composition of that article to the extent of 25 or 30 per cent and which contributes to its color.

That is the purpose of it, Mr. Chairman; and I want to say now that in the discussion or in the hearing of the matter before the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be a member, recognizing that fact, and believing it to be important that some amendment should be added, I offered the following:

Amend section 1, by adding after "butter," in the seventh line of said section, the following:

"And provided further, That the use of pure milk, cream, or butter as an ingredient of oleomargarine shall not be prohibited."

The majority of that committee saw fit to vote down that amendment. If it did not do any harm—if you did not mean to exclude the said ingredients—what was the necessity that it should be voted down? I give notice now, Mr. Chairman, that at the proper time I shall again offer this amendment to this bill.

I do not contend, Mr. Chairman, that the States have not the right to exercise police powers, but I do contend that the Federal Government has no right to delegate to the State or to attempt to delegate to the State a power, exercised in its police capacity, that will deprive a healthful article of food of the right to be sold in the markets of this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to quote to you or refer you to the evidence of Mr. Gage, that this bill is not a bill for revenue.

On page 561 of the Senate hearings he says:

There is, in my opinion, an objection to the bill on either theory. If it is a revenue producer, it is superfluous; we do not need it. If it is not a revenue producer, then the title of the bill is a misnomer, and it is inoperative in the name of revenue. It seems to me that on either theory there are serious objections to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the title of this bill is a misnomer and the evident purpose, or at least the asserted purpose of the advocates of this bill, is that it shall drive out fraud that is now being perpetrated in the sale of oleomargarine. But that is not their purpose. The purpose of the bill is to drive out competition for butter through the operation of this bill, and the bill, so far as its title is concerned, is a misnomer. These gentlemen who in their eagerness, zeal, love, and affection for the farmer would protect the great dairy interests (as they say) of this country, come to Congress and present a bill the face and title of which shows that it is a fraud. That instead of being a bill for the purpose of raising revenue it is a bill to suppress a legitimate industry of the country.

Mr. Chairman, why should oleomargarine be suppressed? Can any man give reason for it, save the dairy interests? They tell you that it ought to be suppressed because it comes in competition with the dairy interests of this country. They are not philanthropists enough to say that they speak in behalf of the toiling workingmen of this country. I want to say to this committee that in all the hearings of the Committee on Agriculture on this question not a single laboring man or a representative of the laboring men has asked the committee that this bill should be presented or reported to the House. They want to protect the interests of the dairymen, and why? This is not an unhealthy food; it is a healthful product, which enters into consumption all over the country. A great majority of the people who buy this product know what they are buying it for and use it for what they are buying it.

The evident intent and purpose of those gentlemen when destroying this industry is not to benefit any other class, but simply to help their own class. What is the position of the workingmen of this country on this bill? They say that they have not heard from the workingmen. I deny the fact, Mr. Chairman. I want to call your attention now to the evidence of Mr. Patrick Dolan, which appears in Senate Hearings on page 308. Mr. Dolan represents the Union Mine Workers' Association, and here is what he says, in part:

Our people, Mr. Chairman, are against the passage of the measure. I represent over 40,000 miners and their families, and I know from the sentiment in other sections of the country to which I go, from talking to people who are interested in our organization, that they do not want to be deprived of the ability to purchase this wholesome article of food. If it is not made in a wholesome way, then they do not want it; but if it is just as good to them to spread their bread with as 35-cent butter, they do want it. And if this measure passes, the chances are that butter will go up to 50 cents, and poor people will not be able to purchase it at all.

Mr. John Pierce, representing the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, said:

Colored oleomargarine is at present retailed at from 12½ to 20 cents per pound. On investigation I am satisfied that most of our people are paying about 15 cents per pound for it, and I can not admit that those who buy it can afford to pay more. I therefore arrive at the conclusion that they must either find 10 cents per pound more to pay this proposed robbery (for I can not dignify it by the name of tax) or buy and eat white oleomargarine. And this to satisfy the greed of the manufacturers of butter, who think that white oleomargarine is good enough for those who can not afford to pay 10 cents additional for yellow, or the 20 cents or more additional for creamery butter, or use the off grades of butter now unsalable as food.

Shall those thus defrauded of what should be their inalienable constitutional right be compelled either to wear in their homes, on their very tables, flaunting before the eyes of their children and of those who may share their board, a badge of their poverty and an emblem of their inability to pay a legalized robbery; or, on the other hand, to contribute from their meager board to the hellish greed of the butter interests, of whom it has been doubtless truly said that they seek to follow the fashion and form a trust, but are deterred by the existence of oleomargarine?

Mr. John F. McNamee, vice-president and chairman legislative committee Columbus Trades and Labor Assembly, Columbus, Ohio, said:

Gentlemen, there are hundreds of thousands of our citizens in moderate circumstances who are now looking to the United States Senate for protection against the perpetration of such a gross injustice. They are depending absolutely upon that sense of justice, that sense of honor, fair play, and conservatism which has always characterized this body to protect them from this, one of the most culpable violations of their rights which any individual or combination of individuals has ever attempted to perpetrate upon the American public.

They are looking to this body with the firm hope that its traditional love of justice will prevail and predominate in this crisis. Should this measure become a law, arising from the mists of the near future there will come a monster into whose insatiable maw the contributions of our citizens shall continually flow, and whose appetite shall be increased by all attempts at its gratification. This monster we have all, in our apprehensive conviction of the certainty of its existence, learned to regard as the creamery trust of the future—the combination of creamery interests into one great organization, which shall monopolize the manufacture not only of the food product known as butter, but of everything of that nature.

These men come before you in their representative capacity, knowing the needs, the wants, and desires of the members of their respective unions, and they tell you that this bill is not demanded by any of them.

But, Mr. Chairman, if this legislation is to be had for the benefit solely of the dairy interests, how is it to be justified? I contend, and shall do so without fear of successful contradiction, that the dairy interests of this country are not needing such legislation as this bill proposes to give them. Why, they are more prosperous, their farms are representing more money, their products are commanding a better price, the whole industry is more thriving than ever before in the history of this country.

But these men recognize the wholesomeness of this product, and as an important article entering into the commerce of the United States. They can look out into the future and see the development of the farming interests of this country—the corn, the cotton, the hogs, and the cattle; they can see that this product emanating from those sources will some day rise to the magnitude that it will be a competing industry with dairy butter in its mission to feed the millions.

They talk to you about the farmers. Mr. Chairman, who are the farmers of this country? Is it the man who keeps his bobtail brindle dairy cow on the north side of the hills of Virginia or North Carolina, or is it the man who, toiling from early morn to the close of day, produces the great products of this country that go to sustain the life of the business and commerce of the nation? Why, my farmer friend, you who represent the farmer that feeds his cow upon the broom sedge and pine bushes that grow upon the side of the hill, let me say to you that his market will not be damaged by this industry.

His market will not be and is not damaged by the production of oleomargarine, nor will the price of his butter decrease. Why, Mr. Chairman? Because there is not a man here representing a rural constituency who has a market in the town within that community who does not know that every housewife takes her butter, whether it be yellow or white, to the country merchant as a matter of barter, and he has got to take it in order to hold the trade of that good woman.

There is not a man on the floor that does not know that that is the exact case. They tell you that you must not bring oleomargarine in here in the shape or in the dress of the dairy butter; that oleomargarine must come in on its own color; must not imitate in dress the dairy butter of the country. Why, Mr. Chairman, the oleomargarine dealer can claim with all due consideration that there is at least one part of the dress wherein oleomargarine does not imitate all butter, and that is it doesn't have to have its hair combed before it goes to the market. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the dairy interests of this country that your business is prospering, and I do not want you to take my opinion for that. Mr. Lestrade, a butterman, before the Senate committee (pp. 166 and 171) says that the buttermen are making better profits than ever before. Mr. Kimball, on page 55 of the House hearing, says that butter was then 2 cents a pound higher than formerly.

Mr. Sharpless says (Senate hearings, p. 228) that he receives 35 cents per pound for his entire output, and that his neighbors receive from 25 cents up. C. H. Royce (p. 379) says he gets 50 cents a pound. But particularly I want to refer you to the statement of Governor Hoard, the godfather of this proposed legislation (p. 64 of the House hearings), to the effect that the dairy industry has made more rapid strides than any other industry in the country. I also want to refer you to page 439, where Mr. Jett asked Mr. Adams (another earnest worker for this bill) if the industry was not more prosperous than ever before, to which Mr. Adams answered, "Yes, sir."

Again, on page 234 of the present hearing, let me call your attention to the further evidence in that particular. Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, of the Committee on Agriculture, said to Mr. Adams:

I would like to ask you this: Taking the different agricultural interests of this country and comparing them, the ranchman, the wheat man, the cotton raiser, and all that, is not the most prosperous man to-day in the great dairy sections, Ohio, Wisconsin, New York, wherever they exist? Is not the land higher, and are not the farmers in those sections more prosperous than anywhere else?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, we find from the evidence in this case—and I want to look at it from the evidence—that there is no such danger of affecting the industry of the dairies of this country at this time (or any other time, for that matter) that should bring them before the Congress of the United States to ask that it pass this restrictive legislation against oleomargarine. But it is the selfish motive, a motive looking into the future, which persuades them. They can for years to come, with all competition driven out of the market, provide a trust that will dictate to the consumer, the rich man and the poor man, and every other citizen, the price which he will pay for the dairy butter, or else that he shall do without it.

There is not an ingredient entering into the manufacture of oleomargarine that is not a product of the farm. It is made wholly of beef fat, hog fat, the finest grade of cotton-seed oil, milk, cream, and butter; and whenever the Congress strikes down this great industry, as it will do by the suppressive taxation provided for in this bill, it stabs the interests of every farmer in this broad land except the so-called dairy farmer or creamery farmer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the provisions of this bill as calculated to prevent fraud, I should like some distinguished member on the other side to show me how this bill will prevent the fraud that is now being practiced. What is this fraud? I am not in sympathy with it. I want to say to this House that I would vote for any measure which in my opinion would serve to restrict to the minimum amount the fraud practiced by the oleomargarine people. I would be willing to provide for any punishment which may tend to procure that result. But does this bill do that? The contention has been—and it is a fact—that the fraud in this case has been practiced by the retail dealer in oleomargarine.

Under the provisions of the present law he is allowed to sell, not the package as it comes from the manufacturer, but from the package, and in doing this he takes from the firkin of oleomargarine such quantity as he is called upon to sell, wraps it up, brands the paper, folds it over, and then hands it to the customer—with the knowledge possibly of the customer that it is oleomargarine or with the knowledge possibly that it is not. Now, if your purpose is not to tax this industry out of existence, I ask you to tell me how, under the existing law, you are going to obviate the same species of fraud under the working of this bill?

You say to me that because of the fact that the profit will not be great the fraud will be less. I deny it. I take the position that this is an industry that has come to stay, that if you undertake to restrict it you can not prevent the fraud, because I believe that to protect their interests the manufacturers of this article will, if driven to that point, be induced to make it upon a cheaper scale and put into it articles less healthful, less wholesome, and to that extent the injury will fall upon the public.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the small profit there will be in the business by reason of the increased taxation, instead of deterring retail dealers from the attempt to practice fraud, will be an incentive in that direction, because of the fact that they will have to sell more of the product in order to make the business a prosperous one. Along that line I want to call your attention to the evidence of Secretary Gage on page 564 of the Senate Hearings, which I hold in my hand and to which I have already adverted. Says Senator MONEY:

You say the greater the protection the greater the incentive to fraud. A similar rule would apply here, would it not?

Secretary GAGE. Undoubtedly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the evidence of a man whose business it has been to supervise the execution of the law with reference to this article of oleomargarine and all other revenue-yielding products of this country. It is his judgment; and however much you or I may differ from him politically, we are confronted with the fact that he is a man of ability, a man of sense, man of judgment, and that his evidence is entitled to great weight. I place it against the views of the gentlemen on the other side who say that no fraud will be practiced by reason of the operation of this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen supporting this legislation come to us and say, "We are unable to procure the enforcement of the State laws with regard to oleomargarine." They flaunt in our faces the fact that 32 States of this Union have enacted laws against the sale of colored oleomargarine. But I undertake to say, upon my own responsibility, however, that such legislation has been procured in the different States—as this legislation is sought to be procured—by the lobbyists of the dairy interests of this country going to the legislatures, and without disclosing the real object and intent of their bill, foisting upon the respective States legislation providing for the sale of uncolored oleomargarine. Why do I say this? Because all the statutes of all the different States are in almost identically the same words, and those are the words embraced in the proviso of this bill.

But you say the States will not enforce the law. Ah, gentlemen, what a commentary that is upon the judiciary of this country. How do you account for it? You say that there is a public sentiment against the enforcement of this law. Mr. Chairman, public sentiment rules the country. You are here by reason of the public sentiment which says that you should be here. A law that is not enforced because of a public sentiment against it does not reflect the opinion of the people standing behind the law. So far as concerns the State which in part I have the honor to represent here, and which has placed on its statute books a provision like this, I wish to say that, within my individual knowledge, I do not know of a single criminal prosecution in my part of the State under the statute prohibiting the sale of colored oleomargarine, even though it is the fact that over 2,000,000 pounds have been sold in that State during the year 1900.

You can not, gentlemen, buck up, if I may use that expression, against this public sentiment. You are pandering to it now in your section of the country in advocating this bill. But, gentlemen, it is a sentiment that will always rule legislation. It is a sentiment that will always control the enactments for the government of the States. And it is a sentiment, gentlemen, that should control, that no man ought to try to "down," for he can not succeed in downing it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are gentlemen here who profess that they want to protect the consumer. I want to ask those gentlemen, especially the honorable member from Connecticut, who reported this bill [Mr. HENRY], if he desires to protect the citizens and the people of this country from imposition in food matters, I want to ask him what he has to say with regard to renovated butter?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut rose.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I think the question of renovated butter has been discussed in this House pretty fully. The question has been asked me several times. I want to say again, emphatically, that I would favor separate legislation to restrict the sale of renovated butter, to compel it to be sold for just what it is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why did not your committee put it in this bill, then?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. As my friend well knows, it has no place on this bill. We will discuss that at the proper time, and I am sure that we will stand shoulder to shoulder upon that proposition when that time comes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will you vote for a bill to prevent the sale of colored butter?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I am going to test the gentleman's candor. In the Committee on Agriculture I offered an amendment relating to renovated butter. My friend and his associates on that committee defeated that amendment. I want, at the proper time, to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and which I ask to have read.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the gentleman will allow me one minute.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I certainly shall object, on behalf of the majority of the committee, to any amendments to this bill except such as are authorized by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to cause a rigid sanitary inspection to be made from time to time, and at such times as he may deem necessary, of all factories and storehouses where butter is renovated; and all butter renovated at such places shall be carefully inspected in the same manner and to the same extent and purpose that meat products are now inspected. The quantity and quality of butter renovated shall be reported monthly. All renovated butter shall be designated as such by marks, brands, and labels, and the words "Renovated butter" shall be printed on all packages thereof, in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be sold only as renovated butter. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500 and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than six months.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall make all needful sanitary and other rules and regulations for carrying this section into effect, and no renovated butter shall be shipped or transported from one State to another or to foreign countries unless inspected as provided in this section.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the proponents of this bill are so inordinately in love with the people of this country who are being imposed upon, if they have so much at heart the health of the people of these United States that they want to protect them, I want to ask, in the name of justice, in the name of humanity, in the name of decency, and in the name of right, upon what ground can they afford to vote against that amendment?

The gentleman has said that he did not think it was expedient at this time. Why, sir, I want to quote an authority with whom he seems to be in love, and whom that side of the House have referred to, and that is Secretary Wilson, the Secretary of Agriculture, a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, the man to whom they look as their oracle, their Moses who shall lead them out of the wilderness, in dictating the policy of this legislation. They called him in; and I want to read to you what he said in his evidence with regard to the provision for renovated butter. In the Senate hearings, page 419, we find the following:

Senator MONEY. The testimony here has been that there are several grades of butter, as well as of oleomargarine, and there is a grade of butter which is denominated by some "renovated" and by some "resurrected" butter, and they said that it was white, sour, rancid, and had a great many other obnoxious features to it; that it had gone through a certain process of ladling; that a little oil was added to it, and different things that go into the composition of oleomargarine were added to it, and then the coloring. Does that deceive anybody?

Secretary WILSON. It does.

Senator MONEY. You then favor putting in a clause here that will prevent everybody from coloring butter?

Secretary WILSON. No, I would not. I would have no objection to a clause which would prevent the coloring of renovated butter. Cow butter is naturally yellow.

And again:

Senator MONEY. What about the man who colors the poor butter; is he a thief also?

Secretary WILSON. The renovated butter is as much of a swindle as oleomargarine.

Now, again, Secretary Wilson (Senate Hearings, p. 422) says in answer to a question of the chairman, speaking of this renovated butter:

Secretary WILSON. Exactly. It is shipped by these people to the markets and sold for what they can get; and generally the merchant handles it without profit, because he sells goods by it.

The CHAIRMAN. So that self-interest would tend to——

Secretary WILSON. Yes. They take a mass of this stuff with as many colors as Jacob's coat and reduce it to one color, and they use chemicals. I have known lime to be used for that purpose. That kind of butter gets a bacteria, the bacteria of decomposition, and they have to use strong chemicals in order to destroy and kill that bacteria. Then they put the thing on the market, and if we happen to eat it we have to take chances on those chemicals.

Is my friend going to permit the dear, beloved people of this country to take the chances of ruining the alimentary canal by what they eat in butter of that kind? If he is not, I give him the opportunity to say so now.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The gentleman's eloquence almost convinces me; and I am quite convinced that he is right in so far as he denounces renovated butter; and I am also in accord with Secretary Wilson in his statement. But under present conditions we shall have to insist that they be considered in a different bill.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. When will you do that?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Whenever the gentleman will unite with me in the committee in bringing in a bill.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. What is the present condition that prevents it being brought in now? Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. For the present, if possible, we propose to vote upon this bill precisely as the committee reported it to the House.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Why does my friend say that? Is he going to bind this House arbitrarily? Is he making the assertion that if something is offered that would be a benefit to the public that he will not support it because he did not introduce it?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, no.

Mr. STEELE. It looks that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. It looks very much that way, as the gentleman from Indiana states. [Renewed laughter.] Why, my friend, if this renovated butter process continues, you will go into the graveyards of the poor men of your State and you will see a slab raised to the memory of some man and all that remains of him, and you will find inscribed thereon that he died of "renovated butter." [Laughter.] And yet my friend will vote against inserting a provision to prevent its sale. Why, Mr. Chairman, I respect my honored friend from Connecticut. He is a good man, a man of character, and I have been impressed by his ability. Why, sir, sometimes when I think of him I recall the eulogy of Pollok upon Lord Byron, when he said:

Where fancy halted, weary in his flight
In other men, his, fresh as morning rose,
And soared untrodden heights, and seemed at home
Where angels bashful looked. * * *
Stood on the Alps, stood on the Appenines,
And with the thunder talked, as friend to friend;
Then turned, and with the grasshopper, who sang
His evening song beneath his feet, conversed.
* * * * * *
All thoughts, all maxims, sacred and profane;
All creeds, all seasons, Time, Eternity;
All that was hated, and all that was dear;
All that was hoped, all that was frank by man,
He tossed about as tempest-withered leaves,
Then, smiling, looked upon the wreck he made.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that eulogy is due to the gentleman from Connecticut. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Is that a eulogy on oleomargarine?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. Is that a eulogy on oleomargarine?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. It is a eulogy upon the magnificence, grandeur, and sublime ideas of the gentleman from Connecticut, and you may include renovated butter.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Has this any connection with renovated butter?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Well, Mr. Chairman, it certainly has, if you can connect the gentleman with the rancid butter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, again I find here that this dairy interest has brought to its relief Mr. Aaron Jones, chairman of the National Grange of the United States. To give evidence? No. To present a single petition from a single grange of this country before that committee? No. Not to present a petition; but the substance and the bulk of his statement is that if you gentlemen on this side and you gentlemen on the other side do not vote for this bill your constituents will remember you when you run again for Congress.

Mr. Chairman, has it come to that state of affairs; have we that condition in this magnificent country of ours that any man, whether he represents a grange or anybody else, can come before a great committee of the House of Representatives and say to that committee, unless you vote for this bill you shall not return to Congress. Mr. Chairman, I believe that every member here ought to have, and I further believe that every member does have, the confidence of his constituency, and if he has not he has no business coming back here.

Furthermore, I believe that there is not a constituency, sir, that will force any member to vote for any measure which is against his conscientious principles and honest opinions under the oath he has taken as a member of this House. I know that I speak for my district. I am not a farmer and not a dairyman. I have no interest in these matters save and except as they affect the public at large.

I want to state to you that Mr. Charles Y. Knight, the industrious, the vigilant, and, I might almost say, the unscrupulous secretary of the National Dairy Union, flooded my district last year, when I was a candidate for renomination, with any number of these postal cards, asking that they be signed and sent here requesting me to vote for that bill. But I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, and I am proud to speak for the honor and intelligence of my community and of my constituency, that only one of these cards ever reached my desk requesting my support of the bill, while I received numerous letters, inclosing such cards unsigned, stating to me: "Do as you please with this thing; I do not know anything about it." [Laughter.]

There was one man, Mr. Chairman, who raised against me a personal objection in one of my counties—the owner of a dairy—who, and I will say was honest in his opinion, was convinced that I ought to support this bill. He raised that objection to me, but it was not voiced by any number of the voters of my district, and I am proud to say to you that I received the nomination of my party without any opposition whatever. That shows what the sentiment is there, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption right there?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. You live in Kentucky and in a good dairy country?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I live in Kentucky, but not in a dairy section.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Where they produce beef?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Yes; a beef, hog, corn, and wheat producing country, and I am glad that we can give you something to eat, for from what I have seen of the hills of North Carolina you can not raise it there.

Mr. KLUTTZ. We furnished the best blood of Kentucky and the best stock they have got.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Maybe that is why it is now scarce in North Carolina.

Mr. HAUGEN. Do you raise cotton in your district?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. No; not cotton; but I am here to stand solid against this bill, which proposes to injure the cotton industries of the South. I believe in exact justice. I am an advocate of that principle engrafted into the spirit of our institutions which says: "Equal justice to all, and exclusive rights to none."

Mr. HAUGEN. How much will it injure the cotton industry?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Oh, I will leave that to the gentlemen of the South who have already spoken upon that subject. Now, you talk about the farming interests of this country. Why, sir, this bill is most loudly advocated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HASKINS]. I want to say to you that I represent a district that produces more wheat, that produces more corn, that produces more tobacco, that produces more cattle, that produces more hogs than the whole States of Vermont and Connecticut combined [applause]; and I represent back of that, Mr. Chairman, a constituency that yields to no man from Connecticut or Vermont or anywhere else in industry, courage, patriotism, and devotion to the interests of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. HEATWOLE. How much tallow does your district produce?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. I do not know; we produce beef cattle and ship them to Chicago. Our greatest interest is in the production of wheat, corn, and tobacco. I have one city in my district—the city of Henderson—that last year put up over 20,000,000 pounds of leaf tobacco.

Furthermore, I want to say that my district produces more than one-third of the whole coal that is mined in the State of Kentucky, and, further, that the people who mine that coal, who take it from the ground, are opposed unqualifiedly to the enactment of this bill.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Is that the reason you oppose it?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Not wholly. I oppose it because it is unjust in principle, because it is class legislation, because it is wrong, and because you seek to build up one industry by striking down another. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. One more question, if the gentleman please.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I went and priced butter this morning. I am buying it all the time. The first class was 50 cents, the second class was 45 cents, and the third class 35 cents, right here at James F. Oyster's. Now, I want to ask if any laboring man can eat anything above third-class butter at that price?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. No. My friend is entirely right.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Is the gentleman sure it was butter?

Mr. SIMS. If it was not it ought to have been. Mr. Oyster is a most reputable dealer.

Mr. ROBB. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me a suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ROBB. I would like to know if he thinks we should, by passing legislation, or the refusal to enact legislation, encourage economic conditions in the country which prescribe one character of food for the poor man and laboring man and another character for the rich man?

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I say certainly not. I believe in individual personal liberty. I believe in opening the market to any man, rich or poor, and letting him exercise his right as a citizen and buy in whatever market he can.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see that my time is almost consumed. I shall support the substitute bill reported by the minority. I shall not go into details of that bill. From the standpoint I occupy, from the evidence of the Commissioner of Revenue, Mr. Wilson, who is now dead, backed up by the evidence of Secretary Gage of the Treasury, who is now retired, it is my opinion that that bill will meet every demand that the dairy interests of this country are endeavoring to enact into law, and will accomplish a purpose that this majority bill can never accomplish, and for that reason I shall support the substitute bill, believing it to be the best for the whole people of the country. [Applause.]

From Senate hearings, page 566, I quote the following evidence of Secretary Gage with regard to manufacture and sale of oleomargarine packages under the minority substitute:

Secretary GAGE. It provides a method of putting up oleomargarine in packages of 1 pound, or not more than 2 pounds, I believe. Am I right?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; that is right.

Secretary GAGE. They are, as I understand, required to be separate and distinct from each other, with the revenue stamp wound around them and sealed as effectively as a box of cigars is with its stamp. I can not imagine any reason why that would not be a very effective means of preventing the dealer from opening packages and selling the product as butter. The abuse in that respect would be reduced to an infinitesimal amount. Of course the dealer could cut a package in two, obliterate the stamp, and sell half a pound at a time as butter.

Senator MONEY. That is possible with cigars and everything else, is it not?

Secretary GAGE. It is possible in every department; but the temptation would be so small, and the penalties so great, that my opinion is that such deception would scarcely be practiced at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is to say, if the dealer is required to sell it to the consumer in the original packages and is not allowed to break them?

Secretary GAGE. That is what I mean.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would almost do away with the possibility of fraud on the consumer?

Secretary GAGE. Yes, sir.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in concluding what I have to say, let me remark that I impugn the motives of no man. I concede to every Representative on this floor the right to vote as he may deem proper, whether he be influenced by the pressure of his constituency or by his conscientious convictions. And I reserve the same right for myself. Let me say further, Mr. Chairman, that I am proud of my country; that I am proud of its laws; that I am proud of its institutions; that I am proud of the Constitution that has guaranteed to us the right of free citizenship which we have enjoyed for so many years.

But I do not want to see that instrument abused. I do not want to see it trampled under foot. I want to see that Constitution spread its broad wings of protection over every industry of this country, so that none may flourish by reason of legislation as against another; that no man's rights may be oppressed by legislation favoring any other individual; so that when we look out upon our grand institutions we may rejoice that we live in the proudest country that God Almighty has ever permitted man to rule, where liberty, equality, and justice reign supreme, and where every man has a right of protection in his business as well as in his domicile. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives beg leave to submit the accompanying bill, which we offer as a substitute for H. R. 9206.

We first wish to bring to the attention of the House proof positive that oleomargarine is a wholesome and nutritious article of food, and is therefore entitled to a legitimate place in the commerce of our country. In substantiation of this statement we beg to submit the following testimony:

OPINIONS OF LEADING SCIENTISTS.

"Prof. C. F. Chandler, professor of chemistry at Columbia College, New York, says: 'I have studied the question of its use as food, in comparison with the ordinary butter made from cream, and have satisfied myself that it is quite as valuable as the butter from the cow. The product is palatable and wholesome, and I regard it as a most valuable article of food."

"Prof. George F. Barker, of the University of Pennsylvania, says: 'Butterine is, in my opinion, quite as valuable as a nutritive agent as butter itself. It is perfectly wholesome, and is desirable as an article of food. I can see no reason why butterine should not be an entirely satisfactory equivalent for ordinary butter, whether considered from the physiological or commercial standpoint.'

"Prof. Henry Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, New Jersey, says: 'I am able to say with confidence that it contains nothing whatever which is injurious as an article of diet, but, on the contrary, is essentially identical with the best fresh butter, and is superior to much of the butter made from cream alone which is found in the market. The conditions of its manufacture involve a degree of cleanliness and consequent purity in the product such as are by no means necessarily or generally attained in the ordinary making of butter from cream.'

"Prof. S. W. Johnson, director of the Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, and professor of agricultural chemistry in Yale College, New Haven, says: 'It is a product that is entirely attractive and wholesome as food, and one that is for all ordinary and culinary purposes the full equivalent of good butter made from cream. I regard the manufacture of oleomargarine as a legitimate and beneficent industry.'

"Prof. S. C. Caldwell, of Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., says: 'While not equal to fine butter in respect to flavor, it nevertheless contains all the essential ingredients of butter, and since it contains a smaller proportion of volatile fats than is found in genuine butter it is, in my opinion, less liable to become rancid. It can not enter into competition with fine butter, but so far as it may serve to drive poor butter out of the market its manufacture will be a public benefit.'

"Prof. C. A. Goessmann, of Amherst Agricultural College, says: 'Oleomargarine butter compares in general appearance and in taste very favorably with the average quality of the better kinds of dairy butter in our markets. In its composition it resembles that of ordinary dairy butter, and in its keeping quality, under corresponding circumstances, I believe it will surpass the former, for it contains a smaller percentage of those constituents which, in the main, cause the well-known rancid taste and odor of a stored butter.'

"Prof. Charles P. Williams, professor in the Missouri State University, says: 'It is a pure and wholesome article of food, and in this respect, as well as in respect to its chemical composition, fully the equivalent of the best quality of dairy butter.'

"Prof. J. W. S. Arnold, professor of physiology in the University of New York, says: 'I consider that each and every article employed in the manufacture of oleomargarine butter is perfectly pure and wholesome; that oleomargarine butter differs in no essential manner from butter made from cream. In fact, oleomargarine butter possesses the advantage over natural butter of not decomposing so readily, as it contains fewer volatile fats. In my opinion, oleomargarine is to be considered a great discovery, a blessing for the poor, and in every way a perfectly pure, wholesome, and palatable article of food.'

"Prof. W. O. Atwater, director of the United States Government Agricultural Experiment Station at Washington, says: 'It contains essentially the same ingredients as natural butter from cow's milk. It is perfectly wholesome and healthy and has a high nutritious value.'

"Prof. Henry E. Alvord, formerly of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, and president of the Maryland College of Agriculture, and now Chief of the Dairy Division of the United States Department of Agriculture, and one of the best butter makers in the country, says: 'The great bulk of butterine and its kindred products is as wholesome, cleaner, and in many respects better, than the low grades of butter of which so much reaches the market.'

"Prof. Paul Schweitzer, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry, Missouri

State University, says: 'As a result of my examination, made both with the microscope and the delicate chemical tests applicable to such cases, I pronounce butterine to be wholly and unequivocally free from any deleterious or in the least objectionable substances. Carefully made physiological experiments reveal no difference whatever in the palatability and digestibility between butterine and butter.'"

Professor Wiley, Chief of the Division of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, also appeared before the committee and testified to the nutritive and wholesome qualities of oleomargarine.

The Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate, in a report dated February 28, 1900, finds, from the evidence before it, "that the product known commercially as oleomargarine is healthful and nutritious."

Dr. George M. Kober, professor of hygiene, Georgetown University, District of Columbia, says:

"As a teacher of hygiene, I have urged upon my students for years to bring the merits and nutritive value of this food stuff to the attention of the public, and in the interest of the wage-earners of this country to correct, as far as possible, the prejudice which has been created against the use of this product, provided always it is sold under its true name and at its real value. In this opinion I am glad to be supported by the highest scientific authorities in this country and abroad."

Charles Harrington, assistant professor of hygiene in the medical school of Harvard University, in his Manual of Practical Hygiene, 1901, page 112, says:

"Oleomargarine has been misrepresented to the public to a greater extent, probably, than any other article of food. From the time of its first appearance in the market as a competitor of butter there has been a constant attempt to create and foster a prejudice against it as an unwholesome article made from unclean refuse of various kinds, a vehicle for disease germs, and a disseminator of tapeworms and other unwholesome parasites. It has been said to be made from soap grease, from the carcasses of animals dead of disease, from grease extracted from sewer sludge, and from a variety of other articles equally unadapted to its manufacture."

The truth concerning oleomargarine is that it is made only from the cleanest materials in the cleanest possible manner, that it is quite as wholesome as butter, and that when sold for what it is and at its proper price it brings into the dietary of those who can not afford the better grades of butter an important fat food much superior in flavor and keeping property to the cheaper grades of butter which bring a better price. Oleomargarine can not be made from rancid fat, and in its manufacture great care must be exercised to exclude any material however slightly tainted.

Judge Hughes, of the Federal court of Virginia, in a decision, says:

"It is a fact of common knowledge that oleomargarine has been subjected to the severest scientific scrutiny, and has been adopted by every leading government in Europe as well as America for use by their armies and navies. Though not originally invented by us, it is a gift of American enterprise and progressive invention to the world. It has become one of the conspicuous articles of interstate commerce, and furnishes a large income to the General Government annually."

Believing that this testimony establishes beyond controversy that oleomargarine is a nutritious and wholesome article of food, the main question to be considered is the complaint that fraud is practiced in its sale.

In this connection the minority directs attention to the fact that the charge of fraudulent sale is not made against the manufacturer. It is conceded that the manufacturers of oleomargarine make no effort to evade the existing law, but that their product is always so marked and branded as to advise the customer who buys direct from the manufacturer as to the nature of the product.

It is charged, and doubtless truly, that the present law is violated by unscrupulous retailers. In view of these two facts, viz, that the manufacturer does not violate the law, and that by reason of his being constantly under the eye of Government inspectors there is no danger of his doing so, and that the retailer does violate the law (when it is violated), the minority holds that the only proper legislation is that which directs the penalties against the retailer, and not against the manufacturer—in other words, against the man who commits the crime and not against the man who does not. H. R. 9206 violates this fundamental principle of equity and jurisprudence by directing its penalties against the manufacturer who is already surrounded by such restrictions as to effectually prevent even the attempt at fraud, while it in no way either diminishes the temptation or increases the difficulty involved in the violation of the law by the retailer.

The fact just stated, that H. R. 9206 is directed against the manufacturer (who is not even charged with violating the law) and not against the retailer, through whom, if at all, the fraud is committed, seems to justify the conclusion that the real object of this measure is to prevent the use of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, and not merely to stop the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter. Indeed, the radical advocates of the legislation proposed by H. R. 9206 have not hesitated to declare that their wish and expectation is that the passage of this bill will result in seriously crippling the oleomargarine industry, and the elimination of oleomargarine from the market as a food product.

In substantiation of this assertion we quote the following.

Mr. Adams, pure-food commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, said:

"There is no use beating about the bush in this matter. We want to pass this law and drive the oleomargarine manufacturers out of the business."

Charles Y. Knight, secretary of the National Dairy Union, in a letter to the Virginia Dairymen, dated May 18, 1900, writes:

"Now is the time for you to clip the fangs of the mighty octopus of the oleomargarine manufacturers who are ruining the dairy interests of this country by manufacturing and selling in defiance of law a spurious article in imitation of pure butter. We have a remedy almost in grasp which will eliminate the manufacture of this article from the food-product list. The Grout bill, now pending in the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives in Congress, meets the demand."

W. D. Hoard, ex-governor of Wisconsin and president of the National Dairy Union, stated in his testimony before the committee on March 7, 1900, as follows:

"To give added force to the first section of the bill, it is provided in the second section that a tax of 10 cents a pound shall be imposed on all oleomargarine in the color or semblance of butter. In plain words, this is repressive taxation."

And on January 13, 1902, in his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, the same witness, replying to the question as to "whether this bill (H. R. 9206—or similar measure) would be demanded if, after its passage, just as much oleomargarine would be manufactured and put on the market as is now manufactured and sold," said:

"In that case, sir, I would come before Congress and demand a still higher tax."

In view of this testimony (and much more of a similar character might be cited) the minority feel amply warranted in claiming that the purpose of H. R. 9206 is to cripple the business of the legitimate oleomargarine manufacturers. In just the extent to which this purpose is realized Congress will be responsible—in the event of the passage of H. R. 9206—for injuring or ruining one American industry at the demand of another; a thing which, as all will concede, Congress ought not to do. The minority believe it to be class legislation of the most pronounced kind and would establish a precedent which, if followed, would create monopolies, destroy competition, and militate against the public good.

THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

The purpose of the substitute bill, offered by the minority, is not to prevent the manufacture of oleomargarine or its legitimate sale, but to prevent it from being fraudulently sold for butter. To accomplish this end, it throws such safeguards about the retail sale of the article (the only operation in which, under existing law, it is possible for fraud to be committed) as, in our opinion, to entirely eliminate all possibility of fraud in such retail sales and compel all dealers in oleomargarine to sell it for what it really is and not for butter. The substitute offered is really an amendment to sections 3 and 6 of the existing oleomargarine law. The annual licenses for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine ($600 for manufacturers; $480 for wholesalers, and $48 for retailers) are not lessened, while the penalties imposed for violation of the law are materially increased.

The minority respectfully submit that the enforcement of these provisions would effectually eliminate all possibility of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, and that, in our opinion, is as far as Congress can legitimately go.

One of the claims made by the friends of H. R. 9206 and similar measures is that it will protect the interests of the farmer. We call attention to the fact that every ingredient that enters into the manufacture of oleomargarine is as much a product of the farm as is butter, and that such ingredients are made more valuable on account of their use in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

In support of this statement we cite the following resolution adopted by the National Live Stock Association at its meeting in Chicago, December 3, 1901.

"Resolved, That the National Live Stock Association, in convention assembled, representing more than $4,000,000,000 of invested capital, reiterates its former expressed disapproval of such class legislation as the old Grout bill, and we protest against the passage of any law of this nature, firmly believing that such legislation is unjust, unconstitutional, and unfair, and not to be tolerated in a free country."

The National Live Stock Association is a voluntary organization, comprising 117 subordinate local organizations of the cattle, sheep, and swine raisers and breeders of 26 States and Territories of the Union, and representing more than four billions of invested capital.

The annual meeting at which the foregoing resolution was adopted was attended by 1,500 delegates, and we submit that the unanimous protest of the accredited representatives of substantially all the live-stock interests of the United States (except those engaged in the dairy business) is entitled to respectful consideration. Representatives of this association, and also representatives of the cotton industry, came before this committee and were unanimous in expressing the opinion that the enactment of such legislation as is contemplated by H. R. 9206 would lower the price of their products and materially damage their industry.

The minority directs attention also to the significant fact that the passage of House bill 9206 (or similar measure) is demanded solely by the producers of butter and not by consumers, who might naturally be supposed to ask for protection from a fraudulent product if they felt themselves in need of it. On the contrary, the consumers, as represented by hundreds of labor organizations representing many thousands of workingmen, have protested against the passage of this measure as one calculated to deprive them of a cheap, wholesome, and nutritious substitute for butter.

The claim that the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine interferes with the growth and prosperity of the butter industry is not borne out by the evidence before the committee. Statistics show that the total manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States last year was 104,000,000 pounds, as against 1,500,000,000 pounds of buter. As to the amount of oleomargarine sold fraudulently, exact statistics can not, of course, be obtained, but it would certainly be a liberal estimate to place the sum of the fraudulent sales at 25 per cent of the total product. Is it reasonable to suppose that the price of the 26,000,000 pounds thus fraudulently sold materially affected the price of the 1,500,000,000 pounds of butter used? Even assuming that the total oleomargarine output was sold fraudulently, it yet represents so small a proportion (about 7 per cent) of the total amount of butter produced as to render it unlikely that it in any way reduced the average price of butter.

And as further supporting the conclusion that the butter industry is not materially damaged by the sale of oleomargarine, the minority directs attention to the significant fact that those sections of our country which are most exclusively devoted to the dairy interests are blessed with the greatest prosperity, as brought out in the testimony of ex-Governor Hoard of Wisconsin, before our committee, who said that a few years ago land was worth only $15 an acre in that State, but as the State began to be devoted more exclusively to the dairy interests land had rapidly appreciated in price, and that farmers had gotten out of debt, had paid their mortgages, and the land is now worth the sum of $80 per acre, this price averaging much higher than agricultural lands in other parts of the country.

In conclusion, the members of the Committee on Agriculture who have joined in this minority report beg to assure the House and the country in the most solemn manner possible that it has been their earnest intention, and is now their determination, to do everything possible to be done to enforce the sale of oleomargarine as oleomargarine and to prevent its sale as butter. To prevent fraud and not to injure or hamper a legitimate industry has been and is our purpose. We believe that it ought to be the sole purpose of all legislation and the sole motive of all just men.

The substitute bill presented by the minority is as follows:

Bill offered as a substitute for H. R. 9206 by the minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives.

A bill to amend sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows:

"Manufacturers of oleomargarine shall pay $600 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

"Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein; but a manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own production only at the place of its manufacture in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $48 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein. And sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section, and to the persons upon whom they are imposed: Provided, That in case any manufacturer of oleomargarine commences business subsequent to the 30th day of June in any year, the special tax shall be reckoned from the 1st day of July in that year, and shall be $500."

"SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word 'Oleomargarine' in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed thereon in distinct letters, and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each one and two pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word 'Oleomargarine,' with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or two pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be at all times so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirements of this act.

"Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver, any oleomargarine otherwise than as provided by this act, or contrary to the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made in pursuance hereof, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who shall sell or offer for sale, as butter, any oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for the first offense not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and for the second and every subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than sixty days nor more than two years."

HENRY D. ALLEN.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this discussion and thought I would be content with recording my vote in favor of the bill reported by the majority of the committee, but inasmuch as certain gentlemen, in the course of this debate, have seen fit to attack the people who urge the adoption of this measure, and to impugn the motives of the members who support it on the floor of this House, I feel called on to at least give some expression to the reasons which lead me to the conclusion that this is a just bill.

Gentlemen have gone so far as to say that those of us who vote for it will feel called on in private to apologize for our action. I have the honor in part to represent a State whose legislative policy so far agrees with the course I now pursue that it has adopted a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine colored in semblance of butter. I have the further honor of representing one of the most magnificent agricultural districts in the Union. While, therefore, I may incur the criticism of certain gentlemen who do not agree with me, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I will owe no apology to the people of my State nor to the 20,000 and more farmers of my district, their wives and children, all upright, industrious, honest citizens, who appeal to me to support this bill.

The opposition to this measure, on both sides of the House, appeal most passionately to the Constitution and invoke the shades of Thomas Jefferson. Now, Thomas Jefferson was a plain man; the simplicity of his character is one of his most precious memories. He loved the common people as few men have loved them. He hated wrong and despised deceit and fraud.

I have no doubt, if he were alive to-day, he would find the Constitution broad enough to furnish ample protection to any industry whose existence was threatened by the onslaught of fraud and deceit. At this session of Congress the various schools of thought have almost daily been giving utterance to that interpretation of the Constitution which seemed to them best, and these expressions of opinion have embraced all shades of thought, from the very broadest, as expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to the strict construction, as expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

The gentleman from Illinois has told us over and over again that the Constitution went out to the people of the Philippine Islands and was broad enough and strong enough to throw out its arms and include the people of these islands within its beneficent embrace. To be sure, he did not inform us which arm it was that was so benevolently thrown out, whether, indeed, it was the arm that included within its embrace the blessings vouchsafed in the Bill of Rights or that arm whose touch brings the right of trial by jury or the arm whose loving caress insures the right of habeas corpus.

Thus, while the gentleman from Illinois believes in a broad and liberal construction of the Constitution, others contend for a strict construction of that instrument and argue that under its provisions we are powerless to relieve that class of American citizens which constitute the largest body of men engaged in a single industry from the ruinous competition of a counterfeit article passing current by the aid of deceit as genuine.

But, after all, no matter to what school of thought we may belong, no matter what our teachings may have been, no matter how loudly we may protest, no matter what interpretation we think ought to be put on the Constitution, that instrument has been construed by our highest judicial tribunal, and that construction permits the taxing power to be invoked in aid of the police power. That construction permits bills raising revenue, which incidentally carry protection to certain industries, to stand as the law of the land.

These doctrines have been announced so often and are so well settled that it seems to me there can be no doubt as to the constitutionality of this measure. I protest that it is in accord with the law of the land. It is the policy of the party in power, and now, forsooth, when for almost the first time these principles are invoked in aid of the farmer, for the purpose of protecting him from that deceit from which he is absolutely powerless to protect himself, gentlemen stick in the bark and say that it can not be done.

They insist that I shall vote to permit the continuance of a practice which will eventually wipe out of existence one of the leading products of the greatest industry in the world. For my part I have made up my mind to not pose as an objector. I shall take the advice of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, when on another occasion he plead with us to join the roll of the constructive statesman, which he now deserts, and by my vote confer a benefit on a class of citizens who, comparatively speaking, have received but few actual benefits at the hands of this House.

Gentlemen raise their hands in holy horror, and especially those gentlemen that happen to represent districts where oleomargarine factories flourish (in many instances under the name of dairies and creameries), and protest that we seek to wipe out a legitimate industry. A legitimate industry? When did this business derive the right to stand before the world and claim to be legitimate? Legitimate means "genuine, real, not false, counterfeit, or spurious." The sole and only object of the men who have operated these institutions, from the day the first pound of oleomargarine was made to this, has been to manufacture a spurious and counterfeit butter.

Every thought that has been exerted along this line has been exerted not only for the purpose of making a product that resembled butter, but for the purpose of making a counterfeit that could be palmed off on the public as real and genuine. Is this a legitimate industry? Is it legitimate to go into the business of deceiving the public? Is it legitimate by deception and fraud to destroy an honest industry that has been built up by ages of toil? The premises of every argument that has been offered on the floor of this House in favor of colored oleomargarine is that the business as conducted at present is an honest industry.

I deny the premises. This business was conceived in fraud, born in deceit, and baptized in deception. It has never known an honest hour when it was willing to strip off its mask. It absolutely refuses to sail on the commercial seas under its own color. It always has resisted, as it now resists, every honest measure proposed to compel it to pass for what it really is. It has become so greedy and arrogant that it defies all law and willfully plies its business in the States where its manufacture and sale is prohibited by statute. And some gentlemen in the course of this argument have claimed this defiance of law as a telling argument in favor of its great merit.

The truth is it is a violator of the law, a deceiver, and a counterfeit, and no man in the face of the known facts can stand on the floor of this House and justly claim that it is a legitimate industry. One gentleman even says an honest competitor of butter. I deny the assertion. It has never sought to be a competitor. That we claim is the very object of this bill, we demand that it drop the rôle of the counterfeit and stand forth on its merits as a competitor. Give us what your premises assume, make it a legitimate, honest competitor; do that and we shall ask for no more. But in order to hide the deception which you practice, and to cloud the issue involved, you claim that butter is also often colored. But by that means it never seeks to pass as anything but butter.

It makes no claim to the public that it is what it is not. The coloring is harmless, and it is still a product made from the milk of the cow. By this means it never seeks to cover its identity and rob some other product of the market that rightfully belongs to it. This cry is no answer to the argument for this bill. I submit that involved in this matter is a great moral question which appeals to the integrity of the Government.

The Government will not permit its citizens to manufacture and pass as genuine counterfeit coin or currency, for this would destroy the business of the country. The same reason, the same sense of right and justice, calls on it to interfere when the manufacture and sale of a counterfeit product threatens to destroy one of the principal industries of the largest class of individuals who make up that Government.

But the opponents of this measure ask us what we expect to accomplish by its passage. We answer there now is and always has been a demand on the part of the people of this country for butter. We expect that this law when enacted will permit the people to satisfy that demand free of imposition and fraud. For years the farmers of this country supplied that demand with an honest product.

By exercising patience, care, and honesty they have built up for themselves an industry of the highest value. To its development and perfection the farmers of this country have devoted years of their best effort and endeavor on the theory that the Government justly owed them its protection in the honest enjoyment of the fruits of their toil, and now in the hour of their need, when deceit and fraud threaten to deprive them of that which it has taken years to acquire, we believe that we rightly invoke the aid of the Government in enforcing honesty and morality and protecting them in the rights they have acquired. Beyond this, however, there is an important interest that seems to have been overlooked in this discussion. I refer to the butter made by the farmers' wives and sold to the residents of the country towns. This is a very fruitful source of revenue, from which the wants of the farmer's family are supplied and by means of which the mother is able to supply herself and children with a few of the luxuries of life. Already the manufacturers of oleomargarine, lured by the immense profits that have followed their course of deception, are reaching out after this market.

I believe that this measure is necessary to preserve for the farmer's wife the country market. The passage of this bill is not sought for the purpose of advancing the price of butter, nor for the purpose of avoiding honest competition, but its adoption is demanded to preserve for the farmer his market, and so that the demand for honest butter may be honestly satisfied.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], after making an eloquent appeal against the bill on the ground of its unconstitutionality, displays the true reason of his opposition and the ground of his unwarranted invective against Democratic members who support the measure by saying "we aid the dairyman to push his hand into the pocket of our cotton grower and cattle grower and cotton-seed oil manufacturers and steal a certain per cent of the value of their products."

But permit me to gently remind the gentleman that for years, by the use of every method that deception could bring to bear, the business which he so eloquently champions has induced the public to believe that it was purchasing something produced by the farmers and dairymen of my district; that the counterfeit to which he gives his support has not only robbed the people of my district of a part of the value of their product, but bids fair, if unrestrained by legislation, to destroy one of their most important industries. You tell us, when driven by force of the facts to acknowledge that fraud is practiced in the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, that the substitute offered by the minority of the committee would afford a complete relief. I answer that in my own State of Ohio we had a law embodying every good feature contained in the Wadsworth bill, so far as the same would be applicable in a State law, and yet it wholly failed to remedy the evil.

We even went further and absolutely prohibited the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine, and yet if we are to give full credit to the statements of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the citizens of his district, in open defiance of law, march up by the thousands, shouting the praises of butterine, purchase, and carry away this product, while butter is allowed to spoil and grow rancid on the grocers' shelves. The gentleman has only added emphasis to the fraud which every member of this House knows is practiced daily. I shall not undertake to criticise either the gentleman or the people of his district for countenancing this open violation of the law.

But he has made plain the truth that the remedy afforded by the Wadsworth bill is inadequate. The punishment afforded by these measures never include imprisonment, and some mysterious force always stands ready to encourage the retail dealer to push the sale, and when arrest comes this same force furnishes a skilled lawyer, who invokes all the law's delays, and when the end of the trial is finally reached this same force is ever ready to liquidate the fine and costs and to urge the grocer on to a second infraction of the law.

Gentlemen with utmost skill use illustrations to show how unfair this principle is when applied to competing industries in the same line. But I submit the illustrations are not parallel. Never before in the commercial history of this country has a counterfeit been so successful in assuming the rôle of the real product that it was fraudulently made to resemble as to threaten to destroy the market of the genuine product.

But you say we will take away from the consumer a cheap food product that is demanded by him, and that we do an injustice to the laboring man. This argument has been refuted so many times during the course of this discussion that I feel like offering an apology for again offering the answer; but inasmuch as it is urged so vehemently, I desire once more to refute it.

Under the provisions of this bill the uncolored product, in every respect as wholesome and nutritious as the colored, can be had at a great reduction in price, and if there is still an honest demand to have it colored, this can be effectually done in any home by any housewife as easily as any other product of the household can be prepared for the meal.

The evil is great, and the remedy must correspond to the evil. It can be cured in no other way than by invoking the aid of the taxing power of the Government. All other remedies have been tried and failed. I for one do not hesitate; I for one am in favor of a remedy that will correct the evil, and on that decision I am willing to appeal to my constituency. Many of those who oppose this measure recognize the worth of the farmer. Indeed, many voice their opposition in one breath and in the next claim eternal devotion to the tillers of the soil. Some even protest their loyalty in most eloquent flights of oratory.

I knew it was quite a common practice with many to employ this method in their campaigns to secure the farmers' vote, but I had hardly looked for the use of this method here, where their vote did not support their protestations. The farmer, as I know him, is an intelligent man, thoroughly posted on the questions which affect his interests, and I warn many gentlemen who have protested during the course of this debate that they represent the farmer and his interests that, unless they repent before the vote is taken on this bill, their honeyed words of hollow flattery will avail them but little.

Indeed, I congratulate myself that the first time I have had the privilege of addressing the House the remarks I have made are in defense of the interests of the farmer. Aye, more than that. I glory in the fact that, though what I have said has but poorly expressed the necessity of this legislation, I shall be able to meet that necessity by voting to relieve the American farmers, who compose the greatest industrial army in the world, from the oppression of fraud and deceit.

Mr. LAMB obtained the floor and said: I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it certainly must be recognized that in ten minutes I can not cover this vast field which other gentlemen have gone over in this discussion. I wish merely to call attention to the sections of this bill and to invoke the candid judgment of this House upon the propriety of its passage. I am not here as the partisan advocate of the majority or the minority report of this committee, but to secure if possible some legislation in effective shape that will suppress a conceded evil. The minority report does not go as far as it ought to go in the suppression of this wrong, yet in the absence of anything better I would accept that.

The bill presented by the majority, while a proper measure in some respects, is fatally defective in others for the purpose which it seeks to accomplish. It must be conceded that unless the present method of manufacturing and selling oleomargarine in interstate traffic is a fraud upon the commerce and upon the people of the United States the Congress has no right to exercise its taxing powers in the suppression of the same. But I deny the proposition that if it be once established that this business is so carried on as to be a crime against the commerce and the best interests of this country; that Congress has not the power to exercise in a plenary way every right, every prerogative that it possesses under the commerce clause of the Constitution or under any other clause (whether the exercise of such power involves the invoking of the taxing power or any other) for the suppression of the evils connected with the business. Who shall undertake to control the legislative discretion of Congress in a revenue bill or other measure directly or incidentally destroying an evil injurious to the enforcement of the laws and against sound public policy?

Are we correct in the proposition that oleomargarine to-day is sold in the United States in a manner that demands on the part of Congress some restrictive measures for its suppression? It is not necessary that we go to the hearings before the committee for the proof of this fact. The condition, the status, of this legislation establishes that fact. Why should the minority report propose this stringent legislation against the existing method of manufacture and sale of oleomargarine if there be no necessity for it? The majority say that it is a fraud; the minority concede that it is a fraud; by the introduction of the substitute bill they are estopped from its denial. The only question then is as to how this fraudulent business is to be suppressed. Shall a mild remedy be applied or a stringent one?

It has been said on this floor by gentlemen who assume to be better Democrats than others, because they may differ with them, that those who approve of the first section of the majority bill are not Democrats. Why? Because, as they say, it is a violation of a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic party for the Congress of the United States to cede to the States any part of its constitutional authority. Assume that that is correct; let us admit (and it is sound doctrine) that the Congress of the United States in the exercise of its powers is absolute and sovereign, and that it has no more right to delegate its power to a State legislature than the State legislature would have to assume the power of Congress. This fundamentally is a correct proposition. Is it violated by the first section of the majority bill? I think not. It is in effect an act of Congress approving and ratifying the legislation of the States on this very subject-matter. This is not an abnegation of the powers of Congress, but rather an acquiescence on the part of Congress in local control of the whole subject, both as to State and interstate commerce. Until Congress acts the power of the State is free to control the traffic of all commodities coming into the State. This is not a surrender of Federal authority to the States.

Whoever heard before this of a Democrat objecting to State rights and local control? The relations between the State and General Government ought to be closer. Real Democrats recognize the people only as a sovereign, and the United States and each State thereof as sovereign within their respective constitutional orbits. If, indeed, there should be any jealousy on the question of the exercise of power, it is because of the exercise of too much and not too little power by the Federal Government. But this section is only an acceptance by Congress, as I said, of State control and regulation of this subject, and affords no just ground of alarm to the guardians of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will my friend pardon me just for a moment?

Mr. MOON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that under the law as it has been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States the laws of the various States which forbid the sale of oleomargarine or other substance colored like butter, under any form or pretense, can be enforced in the various States, although the article against which it is attempted to be enforced is in a package brought from another State?

Mr. MOON. If that be true, what is the objection to Congress saying the same? That is substantially all that is undertaken.

Mr. BARTLETT. What necessity is there for this provision, if that be true?

Mr. MOON. If now the law by construction merely, it would be preferable by legislation. It will not then be uncertain, and there can be no objection to this section reenacting the law, if my friend is correct, which I do not now question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not specially object to the first section.

Mr. MOON. I am now discussing the first section, and only the first section, of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire to take up the gentleman's time, but the Supreme Court have decided in the case of Massachusetts and in the case of Pennsylvania that the laws of those States which forbid the sale of oleomargarine colored as butter, or pretending to be anything else except oleomargarine, are valid. They have sustained those laws, although enforced against packages brought from an adjoining State.

Mr. MOON. That is utterly immaterial to the question I am discussing. I am discussing the question of the propriety of Congress recognizing the superior advantage and right of the various Commonwealths of this Union to control the sale of oleomargarine as butter where it is a subject of interstate commerce, and this section is no violation of the Federal Constitution, and no violation of sound public policy.

But, Mr. Chairman, while I fully concur and fully agree with the propriety of the enactment of this first section, I have very grave and serious doubts as to the third and vital section of this bill.

As I remarked before, I care not which of these bills, when properly amended, may be passed, so that we have some law that shall be effective upon this subject. If the drafting of a bill upon this question were committed to my charge, I perhaps would not adopt either of these measures. But while I do believe that we have the right to exercise the taxing power of the United States, not merely for the purpose of raising revenue as primarily provided in the Constitution, but as an incident to this and as a means of enforcing the other constitutional provisions, because every provision of the Constitution stands together as one and forms a great unit upon which the Republic must depend for its support—aside from that, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of its exercise, not merely as a taxing power, but for repressive legislation, if you see fit so to call it, against fraud—that is, in its extermination on all Federal questions. The only question is, How shall it be done? Shall it go to the extent of destroying the article to be manufactured by the repressive legislation, or shall it be a regulation upon it?

The time of Mr. MOON having expired—

Mr. LAMB. I yield to my colleague five minutes more.

Mr. MOON. Therefore if this section provides, not for the mere suppression of fraud as an incident to the taxing power, but if in its legal effect it be a destruction of the legitimate production of oleomargarine, then, in my humble judgment, it is not only obnoxious to the Federal Constitution, but even if it could be supported by it, it would be a most unwise exercise of Federal power. And I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to this proposition: You provide in the third section for an amendment to the act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine, and that a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound shall be laid upon the same when not in imitation of butter, but when made in imitation of butter a tax of 10 cents.

Now, let us look at the legal status of this question, and see if the effect of that legislation is to destroy altogether the manufacture of oleomargarine, or is it merely to impose a legitimate tax, as I conceive it to be the intention to do, for the suppression of fraud in the sale of oleomargarine. If that section be susceptible of the latter construction, I am prepared to vote for it. If it be not, I can not vote for it, because it would be a violation of your oath of office and my oath of office to sustain it. Butter has a legal definition, and when we speak of it we speak of it in its legal sense, in that view which a judicial tribunal would take of it. Oleomargarine also has a legal definition.

The act of 1886 provided—

> That for the purposes of this act the word "butter" shall be understood to mean the dairy-food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter.

Section 2 defines oleomargarine, and provides that—

> All mixtures and compounds of tallow, beef fat, suet, lard, lard oil, vegetable oil, annotto, and other coloring matter, intestinal fat, and offal fat made in imitation or semblance of butter, or when so made calculated or intended to be sold as butter or for butter.

There you have a legal definition of butter and a legal definition of oleomargarine. The definition of oleomargarine is a combination of these substances in imitation of butter. Then there can be no oleomargarine as a matter of law under existing statutes unless it be in imitation of butter. That, I take it, will be conceded.

Now, when you lay your tax of one-quarter of 1 cent on oleomargarine not in imitation of butter, on what do you lay the tax? There is no legal definition of oleomargarine known to the courts that does not describe it as made in imitation of butter. Therefore, you lay no tax on any article known to the law of the land, and this is merely amendatory, and you give no definition of oleomargarine, which you propose to tax one-fourth of 1 cent per pound. You say that 10 cents shall be laid per pound on oleomargarine made in imitation of butter. When you say this you give the legal definition of oleomargarine as provided in the statute as it does exist. Therefore, you tax oleomargarine as it legally exists 10 cents a pound, and you provide no definition for the oleomargarine under the law to be taxed one-fourth of 1 cent. The result, therefore, is, without an amendment made in definition of the meaning of oleomargarine to bear the tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound, that all oleomargarine will be taxed 10 cents per pound under this bill. This would destroy the manufacture of the article. The legitimate would go down with the fraudulent. We could not support this theory in legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. This question can not be fully discussed in the time I have had, and I have been forced to run over the various points; but I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman, that if I be correct in this construction of the law, if it be clear, and it is clear as possible to me, that this bill (and I concede that you did not intend it that way) taxes out of existence legal oleomargarine, your bill ought to be amended to cover that proposition and protect the legitimate production and sale of oleomargarine while suppressing the fraudulent as far as the tax will do so.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. There is no intention on the part of our committee to eliminate or obliterate oleomargarine as a legitimate product.

Mr. MOON. I am satisfied that it was not the intention of the committee, and yet I am equally satisfied that as a legal proposition you have done it. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If that is the case, there ought to be an amendment. That matter shall be carefully considered here by the committee, and I will be glad to support an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. LAMB. That matter has been considered by the committee.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. That is true.

Mr. LAMB. I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition, as I shall not have the time, to thrash over the old straw of this discussion. As a nonstrenuous member of this House, representing a constituency which is interested equally in butter and in cotton seed, the debate has been to me somewhat amusing. We have had a good deal of virtuous self-assertion upon the part of gentlemen who oppose this bill. We have had the shade of Jefferson disturbed in his tomb at Monticello and brought out in opposition to this bill. We have had the Constitution of the United States waved in behalf of the Texas steer, Kentucky beef, and the cotton oil of the far South.

We have had the Chicago and Kansas City platforms waved over our heads in an endeavor to beat us into opposition to this bill; and I have been somewhat amused, sitting in my seat, in taking the geographical bearings of the gentlemen who have opposed this bill so strenuously. We have had the distinguished gentleman from Texas Mr. [BURLESON], himself one of the largest cotton planters in his State, with only 1 per cent of the cotton oil of Texas and a small percentage of the caul fat of the Texas steer threatened, spring into the arena, with the Constitution in one hand and the Democratic platform in the other, to read every man out of the Democratic party who dares sustain this beneficent legislation in the interest of the American farmer.

Then, when the interests of the great oleomargarine manufacturers of Chicago were supposed to be assailed, we had the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. FOSTER] taking the stand and denouncing every member of the Democratic party who was not standing in favor of oleomargarine factories as against the American farmer and consumer; then again, when the supposed interests of the blue-grass region of Kentucky, which the gentleman from that State [Mr. ALLEN] says is raising beef that feeds North Carolina, were supposed to be in danger we had him rise in his place to benevolently inform us that we are attempting a work of supererogation, and that if we dare enact this legislation the Supreme Court of the United States will promptly undo what we have done. I wish, however, to do the gentleman the justice to say that he has made by far the best speech on his side of the question in the progress of this debate. I have been interested here in observing the geographical locations of these gentlemen. It is manifest that this is not a constitutional or political question, but one of locality.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I have only ten minutes and can not yield to my friend. Then, too, Mr. Chairman, we have had the flout thrown out that those of us who favor this legislation are cowards and cringing before the demands and prejudices of our constituents. I repel that insinuation, and I know that it was only made in the heat of debate, only in the frenzy of certain defeat, and I claim for myself here the right to vote as I see fit, and I shall exercise and defend that right without cant or hypocrisy, regardless of the sneers and flaunts of the interested opponents of this measure.

The Supreme Court of the United States has settled for me its constitutionality, and for Democratic precedent I call the attention of my party associates to the first oleomargarine bill passed by a Democratic House, in 1886.

I am for butter against butterine, for the cow against the cotton-oil trust, for the people on the farm, in the mines and mills and homes and workshops, against the combination which controls the manufacture of oleomargarine.

I maintain, as a Representative of the Seventh district of North Carolina, that I have a right and that it is my duty within constitutional limitations, to stand for the rights and interests of my constituents upon this floor, and especially when standing by the rights of my constituents puts me in advocacy of the rights of the great farming, consuming, and agricultural classes of this country against the interests of these manufacturers who, by reason of admitted frauds are entitled to no day in court and to no consideration in this discussion.

I have no apologies to make for supporting this bill. I stand, not with the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] who was afraid that all the refuse of the factories might again be turned into the rivers, and that the pellucid waters of the Missouri and the Mississippi might be rendered unwholesome for the dwellers on their banks.

I stand by the farmer, but I stand not for the farmer who stays in his office at Chicago and Kansas City, and who puts on the market a fraudulent imitation of a great food product of the farmer and sends it out to drive that product out of the market; but I stand for the farmer who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before, the farmer who digs and delves in the soil, the farmer who in the frosts and snows of winter and in the bright sunlight of summer labors early and late to feed us all.

I stand by that real farmer and not by the oleomargarine manufacturing farmer in Kansas City and Chicago and Kentucky. [Applause.] Ah, gentlemen, the trouble with some erudite and estimable gentlemen on this side of the House is that they turn their backs on the necessities and opportunities of the present, upon the glowing and glorious prospects of the future, and for their political mentors beckon only the moldy graves of past political defeats.

Proposed legislation for the benefit of the masses is too often measured and judged not by its necessity, not by its utility, not even by its constitutionality, but it is rather attempted to be squared with some ephemeral platform utterance of the past, which was inspired only by the circumstances and the necessities of the hour, and which, having served its purposes, too often that of defeat, should be allowed to rest in peace.

Gentlemen too often forget that a cardinal principle of Democratic legislation is the greatest good to the greatest number, and that within constitutional limitation this principle should govern. I am no iconoclast. I have, I trust, a due veneration for the wisdom of the Democratic sages of the long ago and a due loyalty to party deliverances, but I am not willing to be irretrievably fettered to the dead body of exploded utterances and platform experiments of the past.

We can only hope for success, we can only do our duty to the present, while adhering to the fundamental principles of constitutional democracy, by resolutely meeting and legislating for conditions, circumstances, and necessities as they arise, even though some cherished fetich of the past be thereby dislodged. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in order that the real issue in this controversy may not be lost sight of or forgotten, I deem it an opportune time in this debate to recall to the attention of the committee the common ground upon which the advocates of both the pending bills stand, to submit in the beginning what the lawyers would call an agreed statement of facts.

It is agreed, in the first place, that oleomargarine, whether colored or white, is a pure, wholesome, and nutritious food product. This being conceded, it can not be denied that it is a legitimate article of commerce. It is agreed, further, that considerable quantities of oleomargarine are sold to customers who ask for and think they are receiving butter, and that such sales are fraudulent and should be prevented or punished. The only question properly at issue, therefore, is how best to prevent or punish the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine. The view of the majority of the Committee on Agriculture is that such sale can be best prevented by imposing what is intended to be a prohibitive tax upon oleomargarine colored as butter. In the opinion of the minority this measure is open to three objections: First, it is an unjust discrimination against what is conceded to be a legitimate industry, and is therefore class legislation; second, it directs its penalties against the manufacturer, who is not even charged with violating any law, and not against the retailer, by whom, if at all, the fraudulent sale is committed; and, third, that for both the foregoing reasons it will fail to accomplish the object sought.

In asserting that the bill reported by the majority is open to the charge of class legislation, I do not wish to be understood as expressing the opinion that if this bill should become a law it would be held by the courts to be unconstitutional, although many able lawyers are of that opinion. I do wish to be understood, however, as declaring that it is class legislation in spirit and purpose. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], in reply to a question, gave it as his opinion on this floor the other day that the passage of the majority bill would not materially advance the price of butter, and other gentlemen who support that measure have expressed the same opinion. I am of that opinion myself, for reasons that will appear further on in my remarks; but I am thoroughly convinced that if this opinion were the generally accepted one there would be no demand whatever for the passage of this bill.

On what ground is this legislation urged? Solely on the ground that it will promote the interest of the manufacturer of butter. But how can it promote his interest if it does not advance the price of his product? In the State which I have the honor to represent in this Chamber practically every farmer who sells butter also markets hogs and cattle. Representatives of the live-stock associations of the country estimate that the passage of the majority bill will inflict an average loss of $2 in the value of each head of cattle and of 20 cents on each head of swine. Even the supporters of the majority bill admit that the loss to the live-stock industry by reason of the passage of this bill may reach 40 cents a head on all cattle and 5 cents a head on all swine marketed in this country—an aggregate loss of several million dollars. Now, if the price of their butter product is not to be advanced, and if the value of their live-stock product is to be reduced, what possible interest have the farmers of the United States in the passage of this bill? If this bill should become a law, and if it should result, as its foremost advocates on this floor assert and admit that it will, in not advancing the price of butter and in actually depressing the value of live stock, may not our farmers well wonder to what end they have been so passionately implored to demand of their Representatives the passage of this measure?

It is argued that, although it would not advance the price of butter, it would create a demand for more butter, which would result in an increase in the number of those engaged in the dairy business. This argument implies that the dairy industry is now languishing. But this implication is not borne out by the facts. The facts, as presented by the advocates of the majoity bill, and as shown in the report accompanying the minority bill, all go to show that this industry is already in a most flourishing condition. I repeat the assertion, therefore, that the only way in which the passage of the majority bill can promote the interest of the manufacturers of butter is by advancing the price of their product. The demand for legislation for this purpose, therefore, is in plain terms a demand on the part of one industry for legislation which will promote its interest at the expense of another industry. The American Congress, in my judgment, may properly enact discriminative legislation to protect American enterprise against the ruinous competition of foreign industries. But who will say that this Congress can properly lay burdens upon one legitimate American industry in order that another American industry may reap richer profits?

And let me say here that I deny the assertion so often repeated upon the floor of this House and elsewhere. that this legislation is demanded by the farmers of the United States. If there is one class of our citizens in whom the sense of fair play is more fully developed than in any other; if there is one class more utterly opposed than another to class legislation, it is the farmers. And they would no more knowingly demand the passage of a law discriminating unjustly in their favor than they would willingly submit to a law unjustly discriminating against them.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the demand for this legislation before the Committee on Agriculture came from those interested in the product competing with oleomargarine, and not from the consumers of oleomargarine?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman has stated exactly the condition that was developed before the committee. So far as the committee was advised there was no man appearing before it who represented or pretended to represent the consumer, either of oleomargarine or of butter.

Mr. BURLESON. Right on that point, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that hundreds of protests were received by the committee from labor organizations from one end of the country to the other, protesting against this legislation upon the ground that they were the consumers of oleomargarine and would be affected thereby?

Mr. SCOTT. Such protests, representing in the aggregate many thousand laboring men, were received during the last Congress and have been published in the hearings that were given before the committees during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

I do not deny that this legislation is favored by many farmers, but I believe this is so because they have been misled as to the real character of the measure and as to the results it will accomplish. To illustrate what I mean by this statement, let me call the attention of the committee to the very important difference between the pending majority bill and the original Grout bill. I do not need to remind those who were members of the last Congress with what whip and spur the Grout bill was passed through this House last year. It was declared then that the farmers were unanimous in favor of that bill, and many men who voted against it were denounced as the enemies of the farmer.

And yet the most uncompromising advocates of the original Grout bill have now admitted, by the incorporation of section 2 in the pending bill, that the passage of the original measure, instead of closing the door to fraud, would have thrown it wide open, making it not only easier, but more profitable, to sell oleomargarine fraudulently than it is now under the existing law; and it may not be out of place to call attention here to the fact that the gentlemen having this bill in charge owe to the minority of the Committee on Agriculture the amendment which alone makes the measure of any value, even from their own standpoint. I wish to read, in support of this statement, the following extract from the testimony of Mr. Adams, vice-president of the so-called National Dairy Union, before the Committee on Agriculture. I read from the printed "hearings," page 237:

Mr. ADAMS. I want to make this suggestion: A point was made last week; the question was raised by Mr. SCOTT, I think, in a question to Mr. Springer, which was as follows: In case the retail merchants shall buy uncolored oleomargarine and color it in imitation of butter and sell it, would he be a manufacturer within the meaning of the law? As I recollect it, Mr. Springer said no. I understand that a good many good lawyers say no. Now, if that is true, this bill should be corrected in that particular in this committee, and the first section ought to be amended, or the oleomargarine law should be amended, and the manufacturer defined. You should amend that portion of the oleomargarine act defining the manufacture and include within it any man who colors oleomargarine in imitation of yellow butter and sells it in imitation of yellow butter.

It is perfectly clear to everybody now that if the Grout bill had become a law in the form in which it passed this House in the last Congress, it would have opened the door to the most flagrant fraud, simply because it would have imposed no penalty whatever upon the retailer who purchased his oleomargarine white and colored it to suit the taste of his customers. Now, if the gentlemen who have this measure in charge and who had it in charge during the last Congress were so greatly mistaken then, may they not be equally in error now?

The farmers of the United States are fair men. They demand that their business shall not be injured by deception and fraud. In that demand they are right, and the minority bill is framed expressly to meet that demand. They do not demand that any legitimate American industry shall be hampered and destroyed, even though the result might directly or indirectly benefit them.

But objectionable as is the pending majority bill on the ground that it is class legislation, it is open to yet more serious objection on the ground that it directs all its penalties against the manufacturer of oleomargarine, who is not even accused of violating the existing law, and not against the retailer by whom, if at all, the fraudulent sale is made, thus violating every principle of law and equity. Under the existing law an officer of the United States is stationed in every oleomargarine factory, and the business is so hedged about by regulations and restrictions that violations of the law by the manufacturer are practically impossible and are unknown.

Mr. SNOOK. Is the gentleman aware—I have no doubt he is—that in the different States of the Union there has been for years legislation prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine colored in the semblance of butter, especially in the State of Ohio?

Mr. SCOTT. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. SNOOK. Does not the gentleman know that in every instance, almost without exception, where there has been a prosecution of a retail dealer under those State laws, the manufacturers of oleomargarine, who the gentleman says are not parties to the fraud, have furnished the money for the defense and have encouraged the retailers to go on in the business?

Mr. SCOTT. So far as appeared in the hearing before our committee that charge was made and reasonably sustained against one manufacturer only of butterine. But even if the charge could be sustained against all the manufacturers of oleomargarine it does not in the least contravene the statement which I have just made.

Mr. SNOOK. If that is true, how can the gentleman maintain on the floor of this House that the manufacturer has taken no part in the fraudulent carrying on of this business?

Mr. SCOTT. I am simply asserting, what every man on the floor of this House knows of his own knowledge, that the wholesaler and the jobber who buy oleomargarine from the manufacturer get what they call for and know what they are getting.

Mr. SNOOK. Is it not a fact that these different State laws embody every principle that is contained in this minority report, and that the reason they have failed in their execution is that the oleomargarine people encouraged the retailer to keep on with his business, and furnished the money for his defense?

Mr. SCOTT. My judgment is that the reason why they have failed of enforcement is that the public sentiment in States where they have been enacted did not support them. I know something of what it means to try to enforce a law that is against public sentiment. I regret to say that I can take the gentleman to my own State and show him there many communities in which the State law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors is violated openly and with impunity. We can not enforce the law in certain sections of the State because the public sentiment of the community is against it; and if the gentleman can suggest any way in which the United States Congress can reach its strong arm out into the Commonwealth of Kansas and help us there to enforce the prohibition law as we are now asked to go into the other States and assist in the enforcement of their antioleomargine laws, I should consider it a great favor.

I repeat, therefore, that if any fraud is committed—and that fraud is committed is not denied—it is by the retailer and not by the manufacturer. From what possible standpoint, then, can a law be defended if it directs all its penalties against the manufacturer and not one against the retailer; against the innocent and not against the guilty? And is not the fact that the pending majority bill is directed against the manufacturer, and not against the retailer, further evidence that the real purpose of this measure is not to compel this industry to be honest, but to crush it? That is a serious charge, a most damaging charge, and I am not surprised that gentlemen defending the majority bill on this floor have sought to lessen the force of it by emphatic denial. As an illustration of the position taken by the advocates of the majority bill, I will quote, because I have it convenient, the assertion made yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. He said:

Just what is proposed in this bill? It does not prohibit any man from making oleomargarine. There is no limitation placed upon the manufacture of it, and no man has a right to say that a less number of pounds will be made next year than were made last year, even if this bill passes. The gentleman and others have discussed this bill as though it was the purpose of it to drive a well-established industry out of the country. Not so. Every manufacturer of oleomargarine will be as free to make it after the passage of this act as he was before.

I have no doubt that statement expressed the honest convictions of the gentleman who made it; but that it is far from representing the determination of those who have been the foremost advocates of this measure, I propose to demonstrate to this House. I wish to direct the attention of the committee again to the hearing before the Agricultural Committee, and I wish to read a part of the record of that hearing. I trust I may be pardoned if my own name appears in this record oftener than modesty, perhaps, suggests that it should, but it happens that the point I wish to make was brought out by questions which I, as a member of the committee, asked. General Grout, whose name is so inseparably connected with this bill that it can never be dissociated from it, was before the committee, and I asked him this question:

Could you distinguish by its color the oleomargarine you hold in your hand from uncolored butter made from the average dairy herd at this time?

The situation, let me explain, was this: The committee had before it a sample of uncolored oleomargarine. It had also a sample of uncolored butter, made by a member of the committee. Mr. Grout's reply to my question as to whether he could distinguish by the eye between these two substances was:

Mr. GROUT. No; there is the very trouble.
Mr. SCOTT. Then how are you going to prevent the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine by your bill? Can you do it in any way except by coloring butter?
Mr. GROUT. I will tell you. The oleomargarine fellows under this bill will have no rights, will have no right whatever, if the bill is drawn as I left it and as it was passed last Congress, to use any ingredient, whether it is an integral part of the product or otherwise, which will give it a color like butter.
Mr. ALLEN. They will not be allowed to use milk?
Mr. GROUT. No, sir.

Listen, gentlemen! They will have no right to use any ingredient, whether it is an integral part of the product or otherwise.

Mr. SCOTT. Suppose it was impossible to manufacture oleomargarine without giving it a butter color; do you think Congress would be warranted in prohibiting its manufacture?
Mr. GROUT. I do.
* * * * * * *
Mr. SCOTT. You stated a moment ago that if milk or cream was employed in the manufacture of oleo it was done for the purpose of giving it flavor and taste.
Mr. GROUT. Exactly, and some color.
Mr. SCOTT. And therefore it is a necessary ingredient of butterine.
Mr. GROUT. No. It is if you want to serve it up as butter, but if you want to serve it up as the simple grease it is—the grease of the beef and the hog, together with cotton-seed oil—then it is not.

I hope gentlemen will consider well the meaning of this declaration on the part of Mr. Grout. We all understand the difference between grease and butter. We know that we do not spread our bread with lard or with cotton-seed oil or with oleo, and we know that a combination of them without the flavor and taste which is given to them by the use of milk or butter would not be considered by anybody as a proper substitute for butter. It is true that under this bill, as interpreted by the author of it, the manufacturers of oleomargarine could continue to manufacture grease fit to use in cookery, perhaps, but utterly unfit to go upon the table as butter, and I declare and assert, upon the authority of the statements which I have read to you, that the purpose of this bill, as shown by the construction that was put upon it by the author of it, is to prevent absolutely the manufacture of an article which can be used as a substitute for butter; it is not to prevent the fraudulent sale of that article.

Reminding the committee further of the assertion made by Mr. Grout that he would not allow milk to be put in oleomargarine for fear it would give it a flavor and a taste that would resemble butter, let me call attention to a statement furnished this House last year by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which it is shown that of the 83,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine manufactured in the year ending June 30, 1899, over 14,000,000 pounds of milk were used, constituting more than 15 per cent of the product; and it is a matter of general knowledge that milk is as much a constituent part of oleomargarine as oleo oil or cotton-seed oil or neutral lard, and yet the originator of this bill, a man who comes down here all the way from Vermont to insist upon its passage, declares that if that bill becomes law it will not be permitted to any manufacturer of oleomargarine to use what is conceded to be a necessary constituent of his product. In other words, it will be impossible to manufacture oleomargarine at all, and therefore the gentlemen who think that by voting for the majority bill they are simply reducing the price of the poor man's butter are utterly mistaken. They are simply removing the poor man's butter from his table.

But in spite of its drastic provisions, and for the very reason that it directs its penalties against the innocent and not against the guilty, it is the opinion of the minority of your committee that the majority bill will fail of the only purpose it dares openly to avow, namely, the prevention of fraudulent sales of oleomargarine for butter. Consider the conditions as they exist in the markets in this city. The statement was made here a few moments ago that the price of butter in Washington to-day ranges from 35 to 50 cents a pound. Oleomargarine is now sold here for 20 cents. Substitute a 10-cent tax for the existing 2-cent tax, and oleomargarine could be sold for 28 cents. But this is still 7 cents cheaper than the cheapest butter. Is not that margin enough to tempt the unscrupulous dealer to substitute oleomargarine for butter? And yet if he did so there is no single line in this bill to punish him for the fraud. It was shown in the course of the hearings before your committee that the trend of public taste is in the direction of lighter colored butter. In some of the most fashionable restaurants in this city and in New York to-day only uncolored butter is served. It was also shown before your committee that uncolored oleomargarine and uncolored butter at this season of the year are so perfectly similar in tint that the keenest eye can not discriminate between them. But there is not a syllable in this bill to punish the dishonest dealer who sells uncolored oleomargarine to a customer who asks for uncolored butter.

The minority bill, on the contrary, is not open to any of these objections. It does not seek to tear down any American industry, and it does not attack the innocent and let the guilty go free. It goes straight to the real issue. And that real issue, let me again remind the committee, is not the restriction of competition, but the prevention and punishment of fraud. I believe I am violating no confidence when I say that what is known as the Wadsworth bill, in all its substantial features, was drawn by the revenue law officers of the Government. Their endeavor and their one purpose was to throw such restrictions and safeguards around the retail sale of oleomargarine as to protect the purchaser absolutely from imposition. That they have succeeded in constructing a measure that will make fraud in the sale of oleomargarine practically impossible, I do not believe anyone who reads the minority bill can doubt or deny. And that is all this Congress can properly do. It is all there is any demand upon it to do.

I do not yield to any man on the floor of this House in the earnest sincerity of my wish to do all in my power to stamp out fraud, imposition, and dishonesty wherever found. But I want to stamp out fraud; I do not want to crush an American industry. I believe that oleomargarine is a pure, wholesome, and nutritious food product. I believe there is a large genuine demand for it by those who can not afford to buy butter. I believe this demand can be supplied without in the least interfering with the prosperity of the butter maker, because by far the greater proportion of oleomargarine now sold is bought by those who would not buy butter if oleomargarine were not on the market. I believe also that the buyers of oleomargarine have as much right to demand that the product which serves them as butter be colored to suit their taste as the buyers of real butter have to demand that this product be colored to suit their taste.

I do not believe it is essentially a fraud to color oleomargarine to please the taste of the man who buys it any more than it is essentially a fraud to color cotton cloth, which we all know is originally white, to suit the taste of the customer. I do believe it is a fraud to sell oleomargarine when butter is asked for, and it is because it seems clear to me that the minority bill is more certain to prevent such fraud than is the bill presented by the majority, together with the fact that the principle underlying the majority bill is wholly vicious and indefensible, that I have felt constrained to give my unqualified support to the former measure. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Does not the gentleman believe that under section 6 the wholesale sale of yellow-colored oleomargarine will be permitted under the minority bill, notwithstanding the State laws of 32 States?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not of the opinion that the passage of this bill, and the section to which the gentleman refers, would open the door to wholesale fraud.

Mr. HAUGEN. Wholesale sale?

Mr. SCOTT. Wholesale sale, undoubtedly. We must leave some matters, the gentleman will surely concede, to the efficacy of State laws.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not a matter that States have legislated on, as to the color of oleomargarine, and not allow it to be sold?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no difficulty in that matter. I have been trying to show that the Congress of the United States had no right to impose what the gentleman knows is intended to be restrictive and prohibitive legislation upon what we all concede to be a legitimate industry.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman, in further answer, that while some might be sold by the wholesaler, yet it would be in the 1-pound and 2-pound packages, marked and stamped.

Mr. HAUGEN. And still it would be sold under the provisions of this law, notwithstanding the States have prohibited the sale.

Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky. If they sell it at all, they will be bound to sell it that way.

Mr. SCOTT. In further reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and also in reply to the assertion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], I wish to make this statement: In his remarks upon this subject the gentleman from Illinois made the declaration that there is nothing in the minority bill to prevent the retailer from unwrapping his oleomargarine as he receives it and pounding it and working it up in such a way as to destroy the marks placed upon it by the revenue officer, and then selling it as butter. I am very much surprised that any gentleman upon the floor of this House should make such a declaration, because surely if he had read the minority bill he would find that it was framed to prevent this very thing. It is possible, to be sure, that a retailer might remove the revenue stamp and remove all the marks placed upon the oleomargarine——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Is the gentleman correct in saying that Mr. GRAFF made that statement?

Mr. SCOTT. I would not, of course, intentionally misrepresent the gentleman, and I think the RECORD will show I have correctly quoted him. It is true, as I have said, that the retail dealer might remove the revenue stamp and other marks placed upon oleomargarine by the revenue officers, but in doing so he would violate this law. And that is what I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, whom I understood to make this assertion.

Mr. HAUGEN. But that would not apply to the hotel keepers or the restaurant keepers in serving it on the table.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Iowa calls attention to the fact that the minority bill would not impose any restriction upon the restaurant or hotel keeper in deceiving his guests. There are two answers to that objection which to my mind seem conclusive. One is that no restaurant or hotel keeper could use oleomargarine on his table without his hired help finding it out. I never have observed that the employees of hotels or restaurant keepers are the most secure repository of secrets. It seems reasonably conclusive that the use of oleomargarine by any hotel or restaurant keeper would soon become known to his customers. The other answer is that we can certainly leave something to State legislation. If the abuse which the gentleman suggests reaches such proportions as to create a great popular revolt in any State in this Union, the legislature would certainly respond to that sentiment, and would pass a law imposing a penalty upon the restaurant or hotel keeper who imposed upon his customers by serving oleomargarine in place of butter. It seems to me not unreasonable to leave something to State legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Even though it were possible for the abuses that have been referred to to exist under the law which is recommended by the minority, does the gentleman believe that this Congress is justified in setting up the inquisitorial machinery that would be necessary, by the invasion of the pantries and kitchens of the land, to discover the use of oleomargarine as butter by hotel keepers and restaurant keepers? Does the gentleman believe that Congress is justified in doing that sort of thing, even though it is possible under the minority bill that there might be some use of oleomargarine as butter?

Mr. SCOTT. The suggestion which the gentleman from Wyoming makes in the form of a question is a pertinent one, and my opinion is wholly in line with the opinion which the question seems to indicate the gentleman himself holds. I repeat in that connection that we can certainly, properly, and that we ought to, leave to the State legislature the regulation and enforcement of the minor details connected with the proper use of this food product.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood the gentleman to say that the purpose of this majority bill was to stamp out one industry to build up another; and I also understood him to say that the difference in price of oleomargarine in the city of Washington is 20 and 30 cents a pound. If we increase the tax 8 cents, how can the tax of 8 cents more stamp this industry out of existence?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman knows, of course, that any industry involving the investment of many million dollars capital must have a steady market the year round. The conditions which exist in this city at this time are not the conditions that exist in the general market over the entire country during the entire year, and it is reasonable to suppose that the tax of 10 cents a pound imposed all the year round on oleomargarine would be a prohibitive tax. The gentleman will admit that such is the intention of the framers of the majority bill, for one of the advocates of that bill—the president of the so-called National Dairy Union—in his hearing before the Agricultural Committee, declared that if it should prove to be true that under the 10-cent tax the oleomargarine industry could still thrive, he would come back and demand a higher tax.

Mr. HAUGEN. But that does not voice the sentiments of the members of the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I trust it does not.

Mr. McCLEARY. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow me a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. McCLEARY. We have heard about the prohibitive tax. Does not the gentleman really understand and believe that the thing to be prohibited is the fraud and not the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. SCOTT. I do, and that is the reason I support the minority bill. It seems as if the majority bill is drawn on an opposite theory—upon the theory that the thing to do in order to prevent the fraud is to crush out the industry; that the thing to do in order to kill the rats is to burn the barn. The minority bill is framed on a wholly different principle.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow me a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How is it possible by putting a tax on oleomargarine in the hands of the manufacturers to prevent the fraud upon the purchaser from the retailer?

Mr. SCOTT. I have endeavored, in the remarks I have already made, to demonstrate that that can not be done.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman has done it very well——

Mr. SCOTT. I thank you very much.

Mr. MANN. But not well enough to get that conclusion firmly implanted in the minds of many gentlemen here.

Mr. SCOTT. I furnish only arguments. I am sorry I can not furnish understanding. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the remainder of my time, and will ask that the bill reported by the minority be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The substitute bill presented by the minority is as follows:

Bill offered as a substitute for H. R. 9206 by the minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives.

A bill to amend sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 6 of an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine," approved August 2, 1886, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That special tax on the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine shall be imposed as follows:

"Manufacturers of oleomargarine shall pay $600 per annum. Every person who manufactures oleomargarine for sale shall be deemed a manufacturer thereof.

"Wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $480 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be deemed a wholesale dealer therein; but a manufacturer of oleomargarine who has given the required bond and paid the required special tax, and who sells oleomargarine of his own production only at the place of its manufacture, in the original packages, to which the tax-paid stamps are affixed, shall not be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer on account of such sales.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall pay $48 per annum. Every person who sells or offers for sale oleomargarine in quantities not greater than 10 pounds at a time shall be regarded as a retail dealer therein. And sections 3232, 3233, 3234, 3235, 3236, 3237, 3238, 3239, 3240, 3241, and 3243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are, so far as applicable, made to extend to and include and apply to the special taxes imposed by this section, and to the persons upon whom they are imposed: Provided, That in case any manufacturer of oleomargarine commences business subsequent to the 30th day of June in any year the special tax shall be reckoned from the 1st day of July in that year, and shall be $500."

"SEC. 6. That all oleomargarine shall be put up by the manufacturer for sale in packages of 1 and 2 pounds, respectively, and in no other or larger or smaller package; and upon every print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine, before being so put up for sale or removal from the factory, there shall be impressed by the manufacturer the word 'Oleomargarine' in sunken letters, the size of which shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; that every such print, brick, roll, or lump of oleomargarine shall first be wrapped with paper wrapper with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed on the outside thereof in distinct letters, and said wrapper shall also bear the name of the manufacturer, and shall then be put up singly by the manufacturer thereof in such wooden or paper packages or in such wrappers, and marked, stamped, and branded with the word 'Oleomargarine' printed thereon in distinct letters and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and the internal-revenue stamp shall be affixed so as to surround the outer wrapper of each 1 and 2 pound package: Provided, That any number of such original stamped packages may be put up by the manufacturer in crates or boxes, on the outside of which shall be marked the word 'Oleomargarine,' with such other marks and brands as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, by regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe.

"Retail dealers in oleomargarine shall sell only the original package to which the tax-paid stamp is affixed, and shall sell only from the original crates or boxes in which they receive the pound or 2-pound prints, bricks, rolls, or lumps; which said crates or boxes shall be, at all times, so placed as to expose to the customer the mark or brand affixed thereon by the requirements of this act.

"Every person who knowingly sells or offers for sale, or delivers or offers to deliver any oleomargarine otherwise than as provided by this act, or contrary to the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made in pursuance hereof, or who packs in any package any oleomargarine in any manner contrary to law, or who shall sell or offer for sale, as butter, any oleomargarine, colored or uncolored, or who falsely brands any package or affixes a stamp on any package denoting a less amount of tax than that required by law, shall be fined for the first offense not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and for the second and every subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 and be imprisoned not less than sixty days nor more than two years."

[Mr. BOUTELL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. McCLEARY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CROWLEY. So far as respects my position on this subject, I am only able to express my views briefly through the kindness of the gentleman who extended me time, knowing I was not able to remain throughout the discussion of this important measure.

I desire to say that while I have listened with pleasure and studied with candor the views of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this bill as reported by a majority of the committee, and while I accord to each gentleman a right to his view, I feel, as an American citizen, that I have a right to mine.

If I disagree with some gentleman from the cotton-belt region, that is no reason that my politics are polluted and his are pure; and when a colleague of mine on this side of the House walks down the aisle and says that a Democrat whose ideas are so narrow as to permit him to vote for this bill is no Democrat, and that he would disturb the father of Democracy in his grave, that he ought to resign his position in the House and get out of the Democratic party, that gentleman makes an assertion greater than his own position in the party warrants.

If the gentleman from Texas who described all Democrats who are for this bill as being in this narrow-minded class does it on account of his perverted taste, preferring butter made from the fat of the Texas steer, the razor-back pig, and the cotton-seed oil, to that of butter made from pure Jersey cream, then I can forgive him. But I will not apologize to the creator of Democracy, nor to the gentleman from Texas, for my views in favor of this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THAYER. I move that the gentleman have five minutes more in order to explain what is the touchstone that determines true Democracy.

Mr. CROWLEY. I thank the gentleman for having my time extended. This can not in any sense be made a political question. It is a question that affects different sections of our country differently.

The peculiar earnestness from a number of gentlemen from the cotton belt can be readily understood from this fact. Nearly every one of them professes undying affection for the American hog in this connection on account of the amount of oil he furnishes for the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Oh, how they love the hog! But you will not find one of them admitting how many million pounds of cottolene is made from cotton-seed oil and sold as pure lard, to the hog's displacement. Another fact claimed is that each man who sells a steer derives the benefit of the increased value on account of the increased value of oleo oil over tallow; but the steer is always sold by the farmer on the basis of meat price, and not on the basis upon which oleo is selling.

The farmer does not get this difference in price.

My friend from Alabama raised the question yesterday as to the ability of the people of the United States to furnish in a pure state the amount of butter required by all the people, including the laboring class, without greatly enhancing the price. He asked, with a laughing gesture, How many cows have you in the country now?

I answer, take away this humbug product that you propose to sell as butter and let the cow furnish, as God Almighty designed, and those who are interested in furnishing this healthful natural product will increase the number of cows.

A statement has been made on the floor of this House that only 19 pounds of pure butter per capita is furnished, and asks what would be done if oleomargarine were taken away, and asks how much of this would the laboring man get at the price it would sell at. I answer him again, take away this deception and there will be no reason for this inquiry. The number of cows necessary to supply the market will at once be increased.

A MEMBER. Would not the price of butter increase?

Mr. CROWLEY. Does the price of wheat increase because you increase the acreage? Does not the demand fix the price; and can not the number of cows be increased to meet the demand? Let this demand come, and the supply will be found of a wholesome product from the source of God-given nature.

This imitation product has come as the farmers' competitor. It has been branded as a tramp and a fraud by 37 States in this Union, I believe. Farmers in my Congressional district can not survive on a price of 6 to 10 cents per pound for butter. For almost twenty years there has been a struggle to keep this swindle and imitator to itself. The farmers are invoking a remedy from this legislative body. As a class they do not often appeal.

They only ask that this swindle be sold under its own name and in its natural color. Nearly every gentleman who has extolled the virtues of this imitation is now claiming that the manufacturers of oleomargarine were proud of their production and wanted to sell it under its own name, and wanted it branded with its own name.

If they are so proud of it, why have not they for all these years been voluntarily branding it and selling it under its own name? Why compel them to do so now with this substitute bill? I will tell you why. You want to enter a plea of guilty to a misdemeanor instead of a capital offense. You want to admit your guilty name but still hide beneath your guilty color.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Chairman, after the lengthy discussion of this bill, which has extended over two days, I do not feel that I can throw any light upon it, either from a legal, a scientific, or an intellectual standpoint. In fact, I feel that if when I have finished my remarks the members of this committee know as much about the question here presented as when I commenced I shall be more than satisfied. [Laughter.]

I would not detain the committee at this time but for the fact that the district which I represent is very largely engaged in the dairy business, and when all its undeveloped capacities shall have been developed, it will be one of the greatest dairy districts in the United States.

During this discussion we have had offered to us the opinions of the most learned lawyers of this country upon the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality of the proposed measure, and, as usual, those who desire the passage of this legislation insist that it is constitutional and those who are opposed to it insist that it is not.

The most eloquent orators in the country have almost exhausted their powers of eloquence in trying to convince us that this is a measure of justice and right, or of inequality and injustice, according to their respective views of the case.

But I may be permitted to suggest that the Constitution of the United States was promulgated by statesmen, who were at least as wise as the majority of the membership of this House, for the purpose of protecting the business and political rights of citizens and of promoting justice between man and man; and if this measure should be enacted into law, and it is a measure of inequality and injustice, it is safe to assume that it will be overthrown by the courts.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, this is not so much a question of principle as it is a question of interest. We have two great interests arrayed one against the other in a gigantic struggle for supremacy. We find the makers of natural butter—or rather we find the representatives of the makers of natural butter—and the representatives of the makers of artificial butter lined up in conflict. We might as well be honest about the matter.

Fine words and elegant phrases may please audiences and tickle constituencies, but they can not conceal plain truths. There is not a man on the floor of this House but is aware of the fact that one of the reasons why we favor the passage of this measure, those of us who are in favor of it, is because we believe that the financial interest of the farmers and the dairymen will be improved.

And there is not a man here whose intellect is so dense that he does not know that one of the reasons, at least, why others are opposing it is because they believe that the financial interests of the manufacturers of oleomargarine and those who produce some of the ingredients that enter into the composition of that article will be injured.

But, Mr. Chairman, there has never a question arisen upon which the minds of men divide without a question of principle being involved. There never was a measure offered before any legislative body under the bending heavens but what was either right or wrong. There never was a measure enacted into law but what that law was either a just or an unjust one. Then this measure must be either right or wrong, must be either just or unjust. And it is not necessary for me, for a single moment, nor for anyone else, to argue that if a man believes this is an unjust measure he ought to oppose it, and if he believes it is a just measure he ought to favor its passage.

It is one of the fundamental laws of civilization that every individual and every business enterprise should stand upon its own merits. It is an equally fundamental law that no individual and no legitimate business enterprise should be discriminated against by legislation. For illustration, suppose that I am engaged in the manufacture of cornstarch. I have no moral or legal right to ask for any kind of legislation that will prohibit or hinder my neighbor from engaging in the manufacture of a similar article.

I have no right to ask for legislation of any sort to prohibit or hinder him from the manufacture of potato starch; but it does seem to me that I have a right, and the consumer has the right, to ask that the man who manufactures potato starch shall not put it upon the market and sell it as cornstarch. And there is no doubt that if he can manufacture his article for 3 cents a pound, and it costs 6 for me to manufacture mine, but that it will be detrimental to my interest. He has a perfect right to manufacture his article and put it upon the market for what it is, but I insist that he has no right to claim that an article manufactured out of tubers is manufactured out of corn.

I am not going for a moment into the discussion of the healthfulness or the unhealthfulness of oleomargarine. There has been much scientific testimony introduced to prove that it is just as healthful as butter. For my part, all the scientists in the world can never convince me that a food article manufactured in the laboratory of man is as healthful to the human system as an article manufactured in the laboratory of nature.

I do not believe that artificial honey is ever as good as honey that is gathered by bees from fragrant blossoms. I do not believe that artificial butter, made out of cotton-seed oil, lard, stearin, annotto, and the Lord only knows what, is as nutritious as butter made from the milk of cows. As I said a moment ago, the scientists have produced testimony that it is, and if anyone desires to believe that proposition, he is at perfect liberty to do so. I will not enter into any contention or disputation of the fact; but I will remain a doubting Thomas just the same.

But there is no doubt in my mind that oleomargarine is as healthful and as wholesome as a thousand and one food articles that are manufactured and put upon the market for consumption and sale. I am very frank to say that if we who favor the passage of this bill had nothing to urge but the unhealthfulness of the product we would have but comparatively little ground upon which to stand.

There is not any doubt in my mind but that those who so vigorously oppose this measure have just as much right to manufacture oleomargarine and to put it upon the market as I have to manufacture butter and offer it for sale, and I will go further and say they have just as much right to manufacture oleomargarine and color it and sell it under the guise of butter as I would have to manufacture butter and sell it for oleomargarine.

I would have the unquestioned right to go into any bank in this city and tell them who I was and sign any name to a note for a thousand dollars if I could find a banker sufficiently foolish to let me have the money on the note [laughter]; but I would have no right to put on a wig or false whiskers, represent myself to be some one else, sign his name to the note, and get that money by such misrepresentation; and if I did that I would be very promptly and very properly put in jail.

It seems to me that the profits made on every pound of oleomargarine, colored as butter and sold as such, or on every ounce of oleomargarine consumed as butter, is a fraud—is money obtained by false pretenses—just exactly the same as if I represented myself to be another man and obtained money on that representation.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. EDDY. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. Do you think the National Government ought to allow a man to put on a wig or false whiskers and then tax him for it?

Mr. EDDY. If I understand the gentleman's question it is if I would authorize the National Government to tax a man to misrepresent and get money by false pretense. He would be taxed in an indirect way by being put in a penitentiary and made to work for the benefit of the public. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. EDDY. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. Would not that be a proper thing to do to a man who put colored oleomargarine off for butter.

Mr. EDDY. We have not gone that far. I do not know how far I would go.

Mr. TAWNEY. This does not authorize the sale of colored oleomargarine as butter; it allows the sale of it as oleomargarine, just the same.

Mr. EDDY. There is very little colored oleomargarine sold as oleomargarine, and I am coming to that point now. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have given this matter some investigation. I have asked in a hundred or more grocery stores for oleomargarine and I have not found a single one who admitted that he kept it. They told me they could send out and get it, but did not keep it in stock. [Laughter.]

I have seen hundreds and thousands of groceries advertising "dairy butter" and creamery butter, but I never saw one of them advertising oleomargarine or butterine in my life. [Laughter.] I have stopped in all kinds of hotels in my varied career. I have had supper, bed, and breakfast for 25 cents, and I have been where you paid $6 for taking off your overcoat in the sixteenth story. [Laughter.] I have satisfied hunger in all kinds of restaurants, good, bad, and indifferent. I have feed waiters in the dining cars for bringing a meal, but I never saw the word oleomargarine printed on a bill of fare, and never tipped a waiter who announced the fact that he furnished bread and oleomargarine free with each meat order. [Laughter.]

Oleomargarine has no standing in the business world. I want to call your attention to the markets of Chicago. It is not quoted in the market reports. I have in my desk, Mr. Chairman, copies of every one of the leading daily papers in that great city. Almost every article of food known to the culinary art is quoted. Prices are quoted on from four to eight different grades of butter, but oleomargarine is never mentioned.

Is there any oleomargarine manufactured in the city of Chicago? Do not any of the grocers sell it? Do not any commission men handle oleomargarine? Has there been any pressure brought to bear upon the members of this House from any Chicago representatives opposed to the passage of this bill? Chicago business men are not particularly modest. I never saw a modest business man from Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. We are not here for business, we are here for pleasure.

Mr. EDDY. Modest business men from Chicago are as scarce as packages of colored oleomargarine sold for what it really is. The Chicago business men are hustlers, every one. Now, if this article is such a good thing, if so many people prefer it to genuine butter, why do not they advertise it in the papers like any other business, and why do not they insist upon it being quoted in the market reports? And what I have said of Chicago is equally true of every other city in the country.

What is the reason? The question is absolutely so simple that it answers itself. There is no question in my mind, whatever there may be in the minds of others, that all of the profit derived from the sale of oleomargarine colored, sold, and consumed as butter is illicit gain. Just as much illicit gain as would be the getting of money under any other false representation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the very amusing things that have occurred in this discussion is the strenuous insistence of the opponents of this measure that oleomargarine is colored yellow for the sake of making it more pleasant to the eye. No one for a moment in all this discussion has ever heard anyone contend that the yellow color injected into oleomargarine is to make it more palatable, to improve its keeping qualities, or to do anything in the world to it except to make it more saleable.

Now, why does it make it more saleable? Because it makes it look like butter. It seems to me a ridiculous proposition that one should assert we demand that food articles should be yellow in order, through association with the eye and taste, they would be more palatable. Do we call for yellow bread, yellow potatoes, or yellow meat, or any other yellow article except butter? I can not recall but four articles of food that are bright yellow; that is, johnny cake, corn-meal mush, mustard, and fine butter. [Laughter.]

Why, we have food delicacies placed on the table in every season of the year, of all the colors of the rainbow, and none of us kick because they are not yellow. [Laughter]. I would like to ask the friends who are insisting on the passage of this measure if they would pay more for a yellow dog than they would for a dog of any other color? [Laughter]. The idea that the people are clamorously demanding something yellow to eat on their bread may contribute to the gaiety of the discussion, but it is too childish for argument.

Mr. FEELY. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. EDDY. I can not; the gentleman will see that I have only five minutes of time left, and I have about twenty-five minutes of talk. [Laughter.] In the evolution of food products one article has been often substituted for another. Nothing more stongly exemplifies this than in the case of breakfast foods.

We can all remember when the signs on billboards advertising oatmeal the words of "the world's breakfast" was almost absolutely true. Then came "Pettijohn's" breakfast food and "Cream of wheat" and "Grape nuts" and almost an unending array of breakfast foods, and to a certain extent they injured and supplanted the oatmeal business. They were invented for the express purpose of supplementing oatmeal as breakfast food. Did those who produced oats or who manufactured oatmeal come to Congress and ask for protection against substitutions? No. Why? Because from the very nature of things one could not by any possibility be mistaken for the other.

The buyer's right of choice, the consumer's right of choice, was not hindered in any way by deception. Does any man believe if they had put an article on the market that looked exactly like oatmeal and claimed that it was manufactured of oats and sold it under the name of oatmeal that there would not have been the same demand for protection that we will receive in this bill?

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another very interesting feature connected with the discussion of this case, and although it may not have any direct bearing on the subject, I want to refer to it just a moment. It is a well-known fact that the great majority engaged in the dairy business are small, independent, individual holders of property. The profits derived out of the dairy business are divided among more people, in smaller sums, than any other business I am aware of.

On the other hand, the vast profits which are derived from the manufacture of oleomargarine go very largely into the coffers of corporations and trusts. One speaker has defined oleomargarine as "a nutriment taken from canned meats by the trust, reinforced with a little cotton-seed oil from the Southern planter." This is not my definition, however. I have sat in this House for three sessions and listened to the friends on the other side declaim against the evils of trusts and corporations.

This is the first opportunity since I have been a member that we have had the chance to vote directly on a measure that may very properly be termed "the people against the trusts." I am curious to know how many Democrats will line up on the side of the righteous against the hosts of the mighty when the roll comes to be called. No one on the floor of this House has been more vigorous in his denunciations of corporate greed and the evils of amalgamated wealth and their encroachment on the rights of the toiling masses than the gentleman from Mississippi who is so vigorously leading the opposition to this bill.

But when the first chance comes for a measure upon which he can act in the interest of the independent individual holders of property against the corporations, he turns a complete somersault and champions vigorously their interests. He has many an eminent example. We have all listened on the floor of Congress to the denunciations of the evils of corporate power; these denunciations have come from very many eloquent Democrats.

But the very first time they got a chance, how willingly, how gladly, they clasped hands with the money devil and merrily danced a hornpipe with the monster in order that they may profit from the golden streams which the public are willing to pour out in return for the privilege of witnessing such a performance. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any honest dairyman or farmer or any legislator of integrity has any desire to deprive oleomargarine of its legitimate market. Certainly I have not. I believe that the only general desire is to deprive this commodity of every device of deception. I believe that the majority bill will come nearer to accomplishing that result than any other measure now before the Honse, and I shall support it. [Applause.]

Mr. FEELY obtained the floor, and said: Mr. Chairman, I have some remarks to submit on this question at a later stage of the discussion. For the present, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY], reserving my time.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration House bill No. 9206 (known as the oleomargarine bill), and had come to no decision thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5814. An act to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for lands situate in the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. R. 49. Joint resolution increasing the membership of the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library;

S. 74. An act to authorize the Southern Missouri and Arkansas Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Current River in Arkansas; and

S. 1747. An act to prevent the sale of firearms, opium, and intoxicating liquors in certain islands of the Pacific.

COPY OF A LOST BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the draft of an order providing for a duplicate copy of a bill which has been lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish to the House a copy of the engrossed bill of the Senate (S. 1670) granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla, United States Navy, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany, to replace the original copy, which has been lost.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this order? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. HENRY of Connecticut, the House (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of Charles G. Beggs, administrator of the estate of Benjamin F. Rohrback, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig Industry, James Very, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting a statement of expenditures of contingent appropriations of the Navy Department—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of W. O. Gordon, administrator of estate of Jack Frank, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig Sally, Samuel Wells, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig Good Intent, Oliver C. Blunt, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Commissioner of Labor, transmitting a report on the condition of the laboring classes in Hawaii—to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 199) for the establishment of a light station on Bluff Shoal, Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 415); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COOMBS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 72) to establish dwelling for keeper of the fog signal at Robinson Point, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 416); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 73) to establish a fog signal at Battery Point, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 417); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 74) to increase limit of cost of light-house and fog signal at Browns Point, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 418); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 75) to establish a light-house and fog signal at Burrows Island, Rosario Strait, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 419); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COUSINS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 660) to provide for the refundment of certain moneys to the Republic of Mexico, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 420); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MINOR, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7644) to amend section 4426, Revised Statutes, relating to regulation of steam vessels, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 421); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. DARRAGH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2391) granting a pension to Cornelius Springer, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 380); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2441) granting an increase of pension to Ziba S. Woods, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 381); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. APLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3180) granting a pension to Edward S. Dickinson, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 382); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLLIDAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9848) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Cowgill, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 383); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8631) granting a pension to Mary E. S. Hays, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 384); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8788) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Weidel, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 385); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUMPLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10165) granting a pension to Delia E. Slocum, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 386); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DARRAGH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8782) granting an increase of pension to Myron C. Burnside, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 387); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4172) granting an increase of pension to George R. Chaney, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 388); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7105) granting an increase of pension to Silas Stotts, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 389); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7369) granting an increase of pension to Perry H. Alexander, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 390); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth 4,000 copies of each of the following bulletins of the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State, namely, Calendars of the Correspondence of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and James Monroe, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution by the Department of State.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be, and hereby is, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $1,800 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided by law.

EMPLOYEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit another resolution. I desire to say that it is the same resolution I offered two days ago, and withdrew for an inquiry. There is now no objection to its passage, and I trust the resolution will be passed at once.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That one of the positions of messenger at the Maltby Building, paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum, authorized by Senate resolution of July 26, 1892, be, and it hereby is, abolished; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint in lieu thereof two laborers at an annual salary of $720 each.

CAPT. B. H. M'CALLA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to furnish the House with a duplicate copy of the engrossed bill (S. 1670) granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla, United States Navy, to accept a decoration tendered to him by the Emperor of Germany, the original having been lost; and, by unanimous consent, the request was ordered to be complied with and the duplicate furnished to the House of Representatives.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE, NEAR HOGANSBURG, N. Y.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8761) to declare the international railway bridge over the St. Lawrence river near Hogansburg, N. Y., a lawful structure.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. PETTUS. I have no objection at all to the consideration of the bill, but ought it not to reserve the powers contained in the original act to amend or repeal?

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I will state that I think the power to repeal still exists. The bill simply extends the time subject to all the conditions of the original act. It does not change that provision.

Mr. PETTUS. It does not say so.

Mr. BERRY. The bill went to the War Department. It simply extends the time in which the bridge might be completed, and all the provisions of the original act, with the exception of the time, remain the law.

Mr. PETTUS. I move to amend the bill so as to provide that this act shall in no way interfere with the powers reserved by the original act in the Government of the United States to repeal or amend.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Arkansas that the bill is not an extension of time, but is the recognition as legal a bridge which was not completed within the time subject to all the obligations and duties imposed by the original law.

Mr. BERRY. It simply recognizes as legal a bridge which was not completed within the time provided in the original act?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. This proposed act recognizes that bridge as being a lawful structure. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that it is a House bill. It has been to the War Department. There is no objection to it from any source, and it will simply delay the matter if it has to go back to the House amended. I hope he will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. The bill does not reserve any of the rights to alter or amend the original act, and I insist on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill add as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. Congress hereby reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF DARIEN.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I gave notice some days ago that at the close of the routine business this morning I would claim the attention of the Senate for a few moments upon Senate joint resolution No. 45. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, introduced by Mr. SCOTT on the 27th ultimo, as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 45) providing for a board to investigate the practicability of constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Darien.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint a board consisting of three persons, one of whom shall be an Army engineer, one a civil engineer of known skill and experience in tunnel engineering, and one a contractor expert in the work of tunnel construction and rock excavation: Provided, That no member of the board shall be in the employ of any interoceanic canal or construction company or companies, or shall have any interest in the business or securities of such company or companies, or in any concessions or contracts pertaining thereto. And said board shall consider and report on the practicability and cost of constructing a tunnel through the Cordillera range of mountains, on the Atlantic side of Central America, to the north of the Isthmus of Darien, and along the interoceanic canal route known as the San Blas route, connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by way of the Gulf of San Blas on the east, a tunnel 5 miles in length through the Cordillera range of mountains, an open cut to the Mamoni River, thence to the Bayamo River, to the Bay of Panama on the west. To this end the board will, as soon as practicable, and not later than three months, report to the President, who shall submit the same to Congress, as follows:

First. Opinion as to whether a tunnel through the Cordillera range of mountains, 5 miles in length, and of sufficient width and height to admit the easy passage to and fro of the largest steam and sailing ships now afloat, can be constructed.

Second. An estimate of the cost of constructing such a tunnel, and the time required to drive it, based upon existing tunnel contracts, and prices paid for tunnel construction and rock excavation work during the past five years, and the mechanical appliances and blasting forces employed in such work at the present time.

Third. Such recommendation as the board may desire to make as to method of construction and future operation.

To meet the expenses of said board, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $15,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, provided that the officer detailed from the Corps of Engineers shall not receive any salary except that due to his rank, and the compensation to be paid to the remaining members of the board shall not exceed the sum of $50 per diem, exclusive of expenses, from the date of their appointment to the date their report is submitted to the President.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, so much has been said and written during the past fifty years concerning an interoceanic canal route that I feel like apologizing to the Senate for attempting to add to the literature on the subject. But I feel forced to present some details of a route that has been discussed at every canal conference of importance and seriously considered by engineers in civil life familiar with and interested in the engineering features and difficulties involved in its construction.

The libraries of the United States contain over 500 books and more than 1,000 periodicals on the subject of an interoceanic canal; and in the course of my investigation of the matter I was surprised to find that 225 public documents had been issued during successive Congresses, from the Nineteenth Congress, in 1827, to the present session.

I believe that I am within bounds in stating that nearly one-fourth of the amount of money necessary to construct a canal by any of the several routes proposed has been spent by individuals and governments in an endeavor to find a convenient, suitable, and practicable canal route to connect the two great oceans. The hopes and endeavors of engineers and canal projectors and the desires of the commercial community seem to be nearer fulfillment to-day than they have ever been before; but, confronted as we are by the immediate necessity of appropriating nearly two hundred millions of dollars, ten millions of which is to be immediately available, I think it is the duty of prudent men, and especially business men, to inform themselves thoroughly on the subject, lest this vast sum of money may be misappropriated, and having been expended, we may find that it has not secured for us what we really desire and need.

I speak as a layman, unfamiliar to a large extent with the science and practice of engineering, and in no spirit of criticism of any reports made by commissions or engineers in civil or government service. And right here I desire to disclaim, as emphatically as I can, any intention whatever to obstruct either the consideration of any bill now before the Senate or the passage of any bill, or to attempt in any way to delay the building of the canal itself. It is not necessary nor is it my present purpose to urge the building of an interoceanic canal. Both political parties, the commercial world, and nearly every citizen of the United States agree that such a canal should be constructed. But where it shall be located—upon what route the large sum of money necessary to dig it shall be expended on a work that must last for generations, meet every present and future demand of commerce, and be a monument to the engineering skill and commercial sagacity of this country—is still an open question, and must remain debatable until the merits of every available route have been examined by competent judges.

I have endeavored conscientiously to inform myself of the advantages and disadvantages of the many lines advocated by as many engineers, and this study of the question has led me to believe that the San Blas, or Mandingo Bay route, as it is sometimes called, is the only one that will meet every requirement of a nearly perfect inland waterway to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. Every report I have read commends the harbors at either end of this route, the river along its line, and the country through which it passes; but because it involves the driving of a tunnel 5 miles long through the granite of a mountain range wide enough and sufficiently high to admit the passage of a modern steam or sailing ship, some engineers, and especially those in the service of the Government, have pronounced it impracticable, without stating why the construction of the tunnel which it involves is an insurmountable engineering difficulty, but solely because of its possible cost estimated on out-of-date prices to be paid for such work.

I am personally convinced that such a tunnel can be constructed, and at a reasonable cost compared with the open-cut work to be done on other routes, the Culebra cut on the Panama route, for instance; and many of the eminent engineers of this country and of Europe have expressed themselves in favor of this route, and of the tunnel which it involves. In order to finally settle the question of the practicability and cost of its construction—admitting that in all other respects the route is an admirable one, which no engineer seems to dispute—I have introduced the resolution which has been read. It calls for a small appropriation, $15,000, or $50 a day and expenses for the services of two experts in their line, a civil engineer and a practical contractor. Their report will be made within three—I believe it could be made within two—months, and I do not believe we will have enacted or should enact canal legislation within that time. It provides that none of the experts selected for this duty shall be interested in any way in any canal project or concession; and so far as it is possible to secure them, they are to be men who have actually been engaged in public or private works involving difficulties similar to those which might be encountered in the construction of the tunnel which the San Blas route requires.

I think the merits of this route will appeal to many and certainly interest a majority of Senators. It has not been treated fairly in the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and in saying this I do not intend to criticise. Perhaps I had better say it has practically been ignored by them, and I think the Senate should be informed by judges competent to pass upon this question from an engineering and contracting standpoint.

The San Blas Canal route connects the two oceans from the Bay of Mandingo, in the Gulf of San Blas on the Atlantic side, to Pearl Island Harbor, in the Gulf of Panama, on the Pacific side of the Isthmus. Its first section is 5 miles of open cutting until it meets the range of mountains which traverses the Isthmus of Panama and the Isthmus of Darien. Through this range a tunnel 5 miles long, either single or double, but wide enough and of such a height as to admit the easy passage to and fro of the largest vessels, must be driven. Then would follow an open cut of 13 miles to the Bayano River, at its great bend, and thence 7 miles along the river, or, if a tidal lock is to be avoided, by open cut to Pearl Island Harbor, making a canal 30 miles long. (See Appendix A, B, and C.)

It would have these leading advantages:

First. It would be the only feasible sea-level canal route known.

Second. It would have fine harbors at its termini.

Third. It would be the shortest and not an unhealthy route.

Fourth. It would not pass through an active volcanic belt.

De Lesseps, in conversation with engineers, notably Mr. Walton W. Evans and Admiral Selfridge, said that no canal project which included the construction of locks could receive his approval. He believed the Panama route would not require locks. He was mistaken. But the San Blas route is absolutely a sea-level route, requiring not even a tidal lock throughout its entire length. The delays and possible injury to and destruction of locks and their mechanism, which must be considered in the operation of any other canal route, would be here avoided.

It is the only feasible sea-level route, because the Atrato route is entirely too long, involving 95 miles of river navigation and 52 miles of canals, making an aggregate of 147 miles. (See Appendix, note 1.)

The harbors of the San Blas route have excited the favorable comment and enthusiasm of all engineers whether in the Government or private employ. Admiral Selfridge says:

> San Blas has a most magnificent bay, with deep passage and fine anchorage—perfectly protected from the north winds. In the northwest corner is an inner harbor formed by a circle of islands, with a passage leading into it a mile wide, capable of holding easily all the shipping of an immense traffic.

And from other sources we learn that it has a depth of 112 feet, and the average depth in Mandingo Bay is 50 feet. Inside the harbor at the delta of the river there is a depth of 30 feet within 900 feet of the shore. It embraces 9 square miles, and the islands in it afford fine coaling points and light-house stations. On the Pacific side Pearl Island harbor is deep, commodious, and sheltered. (See Appendix, note 2.)

These natural advantages are not possessed by any other route, and they deserve our serious consideration in determining the proper route for a canal.

The total length of this canal would be 30 miles. With no locks to delay or entirely stop passage, the largest ships could go through this canal in five hours at a speed of 6 miles an hour, or in ten hours at the slow speed of 3 miles an hour. The great development in the transmission of electrical power makes it entirely practicable on a route of this short length to tow by electric trolley, or some other method, sailing ships as well as steamships, and with electric lights along the canal and in the tunnel, passage could be effected at night as well as during the day. This could not be done by any other route. Indeed, it is a question whether sailing vessels could navigate any of the other proposed canal routes. The cost of erecting and maintaining a power plant would not add materially to the cost of constructing the canal, and American engineers would find little difficulty in solving the problem of electrical towing—it has been solved for inland canals—while the easy, safe, and quick passage afforded sailing vessels would add immensely to the revenues, and make it truly an interoceanic waterway for the sail and steam tonnage of the world.

While the Gulf of San Blas is south of the Atlantic entrance of both the Nicaraguan and Panama Canal routes, it is really nearer Sandy Hook, following navigation lines, by 7 miles.

The inconsiderable altitude of the mountains on the Isthmus has been attributed by geologists and engineers to the quasi immobility of the Isthmus itself, and it is fair to assume that of all the routes through Central America those on the Isthmus of Darien and the Isthmus of Panama will be freer from earthquake disturbance. (See Appendix, note 3.)

This route, then, offers great natural and commercial advantages. The one great obstacle which has heretofore dismayed Government engineers and commissions is the construction of a tunnel, which, it is said, is out of the question as regards cost, if not without the limit of engineering skill. These objections are based on contract prices for tunnel work and the development of the art of tunnel driving as far back as 1871, or more than thirty years ago. There is nothing before Congress to fairly and accurately acquaint us with the cost and engineering possibility of such a tunnel to-day. To secure this information from a reliable source was one of the objects of the resolution.

I have ascertained that the formation through which the tunnel would have to be blasted is principally trap and granite, and that it will, in all probability, need no lining. The outcroppings of the mountain range show granite and granitic gneiss. The Isthmian Canal Commission worked out a section of tunnel, providing for a lining of concrete 5 feet thick throughout its entire length. The cost of a single foot of this tunnel, according to their estimate, allowing $5 a cubic yard for rock excavation and $10 a cubic yard for lining, would be $4,268, which corresponds to $22,533,040 a mile, or a total of $94,500,000 for the tunnel alone, and a grand total of $289,770,000 for the entire canal. The Commission state that "these estimates are made without the careful examination which is necessary for accurate figures. They may be regarded as minimum estimates." I am not at all satisfied with these figures. As a matter of fact, they correspond with figures paid for tunnel work thirty years ago, and do not approximate the prices obtaining to-day for excavation work, as an examination of the bids and prices for any of the rock excavation and tunnel work in course of construction will show. (See Appendix, note 4.)

In commercial life when some giant obstacle of nature must be conquered to meet the convenience and demands of trade and transportation, two questions are asked by the projectors of a plan to overcome it. Is it practicable? Can the money be raised to undertake it?

I do not believe anyone will question the desirability of a ship canal by the San Blas route, if the tunnel which it involves can be constructed. We have only to consider briefly the great tunnels of the world, their engineering difficulties, and the amount of money required to complete them, to get a fair idea of the cost and practicability of a ship tunnel. The Hoosac, Mont Cenis, St. Gotthard, Arlberg, and the Simplon tunnel, 11 miles long, to cost $13,500,000, open our eyes to the daring and success of modern tunnel engineering. If these tunnels have been and can be driven, why not the San Blas tunnel? It is simply a question of quantity. A matter of boring a hole in the mountain 10 by 15 feet and then blasting around it a space 200 by 150 feet. No American engineer or contractor will shirk such an undertaking. After the first driving the force could be worked on benches, and the work would then be really open cut work, with this advantage, that the blasting would be overhead and along the sides, from which the dislodged rock would fall to the floor of the tunnel and could be carried away by overhead trolley or surface tram. The work of driving the rapid-transit tunnel in New York is more difficult. The Hoosac tunnel, when Mr. Shanley took hold of and completed it, was a more serious problem.

Mr. C. H. Gregory, before the Institute of Civil Engineers (Minutes of Proceedings, vol. 25), said:

> When we consider the question of tunneling we must bear in mind that it is not correct to compare the cubical contents of a tunnel such as the proposed one [San Blas] with similar works on railways and canals as the measure of difficulty and cost. In ordinary tunnels the limited size of the face and the contracted space in which work could be carried on greatly increased the cost and time required. Great as the tunnel here proposed would be, and considerable as might be the difficulties attending its construction, there would be much more room for working and a large face for blasting operations on an extended scale.

Mr. Walter Shanley, the successful engineer and contractor of the Hoosac tunnel, commenting on the report made by Admiral Selfridge on the possibility of constructing a canal by the Napipi route, which involved a tunnel 9,010 yards long, said:

> The section you showed me presents a much less impracticable route than, from all I had learned of those previously explored, I imagined could be obtained. A tunnel of the dimensions you contemplate is not all tunnel in the tunneller's sense of the term; that is to say, the work would not all have to be done by the expensive process incident to boring. First drive a tunnel, properly such, say 10 or 15 feet high at the top, and all the rest could be or should be treated as open cut, and as such need not cost more per cubic yard than a cubic yard of similar rock on other parts of the works.

The Isthmian Canal Commission have not treated any part of this tunnel as open cut, but have figured on all of it being tunnel work strictly, at the exorbitant price of $5 per cubic yard.

When the San Blas route was discussed at the Paris Canal Congress, in May, 1879, M. Favre, the eminent engineer and contractor of the St. Gothard tunnel, the longest section of which is 9 miles, said he preferred tunnels to ditches and river navigation, giving as his reasons that the character of tunnel work would be known and could be determined in advance, and suggested these advantages, that one could prosecute work in "tunnels without interruption, and the rains would cause no embarrassment or delay," and in consequence of these considerations he stated:

> I do not hesitate to give my preference to the canal terminating in the San Blas Bay, in spite of the tunnel 10 miles long which that project would require.

He was in error as to the length of the tunnel, due to a misconception of Admiral Selfridge, who had not personally surveyed the route or measured the mountain range through which the tunnel would be cut. It is now definitely settled that this tunnel need not be longer than 5 miles.

Sir John Stokes on the same occasion said: "As for me, I give my preference to the San Blas project."

I could quote at length from reports and statements before scientific bodies of engineers regarded as authorities both in this country and in Europe—Mr. Sidney F. Shelbourne, Mr. Walton W. Evans, Mr. Owen May, and others, who have declared that this tunnel is practicable and have given their reasons for so declaring. I will not take the time of the Senate, but will ask you to consider them, and request permission to have them printed as a part of my remarks, in order that they may be before you. (See Appendix, note 5.)

These opinions were given when the cost of tunneling was much greater than it is now; when the Burleigh drill was a marvel and nitroglycerin an amazing force. Compare now the compressed air and electric drills in use, and the high explosives employed in rock excavation. In the work of driving the Simplon tunnel, a hole 1¼ inches deep can be drilled in exactly one minute, and the harder the rock the easier the work. (See Appendix, note 6.)

The cost of excavating granite is certainly not $5 per cubic yard. That is very near the price paid in 1869. The highest estimate from a practical tunnel engineer which I have found gives from $3 to $3.87 per cubic yard for tunnel work through granite gneiss. In building the short-line railroad from Colorado Springs to Cripple Creek, the contractors were very much rushed for time. A heavy penalty hung over them if the road was not completed in a specified time. A number of tunnels had to be driven on the line, and even with the expenses necessary from the rush, this work was executed at a cost of $3 per cubic yard in the hardest kind of granite found in the Rocky Mountain region.

Mr. John Randolph, an engineer of high standing and very long experience and connected with the drainage canal of Chicago, says, in speaking of the San Blas tunnel:

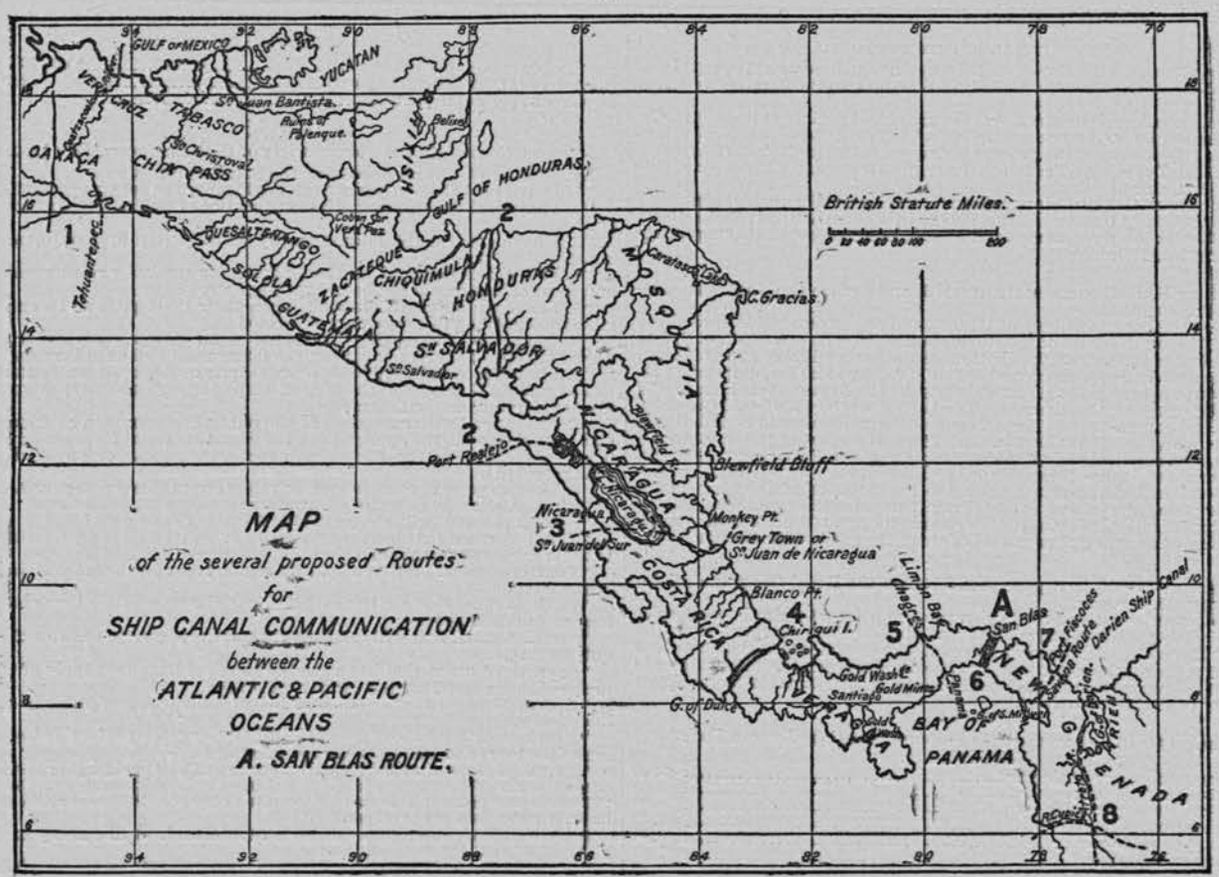
> I believe a tunnel of this magnitude can be executed at a cost not to exceed $2 per cubic yard, and that the earth excavation outside of the tunnel can be executed for not to exceed 30 cents, and the rock for not to exceed 90 cents.

I will add to these remarks a table showing the cost of excavation work through different formations actually encountered in the construction of various completed tunnels, which I have taken from Prelini's work on tunneling. (See Appendix, note 7.)

If we compare the total amount of excavation work to be done on the San Blas route and the Panama route, we will find that the excavation of the former route, even with the tunnel, would be less than one-half the excavation of the latter route, and the cost, if the greater part of the tunnel were treated as open-cut work, would be as 2 to 1 in favor of the San Blas route.

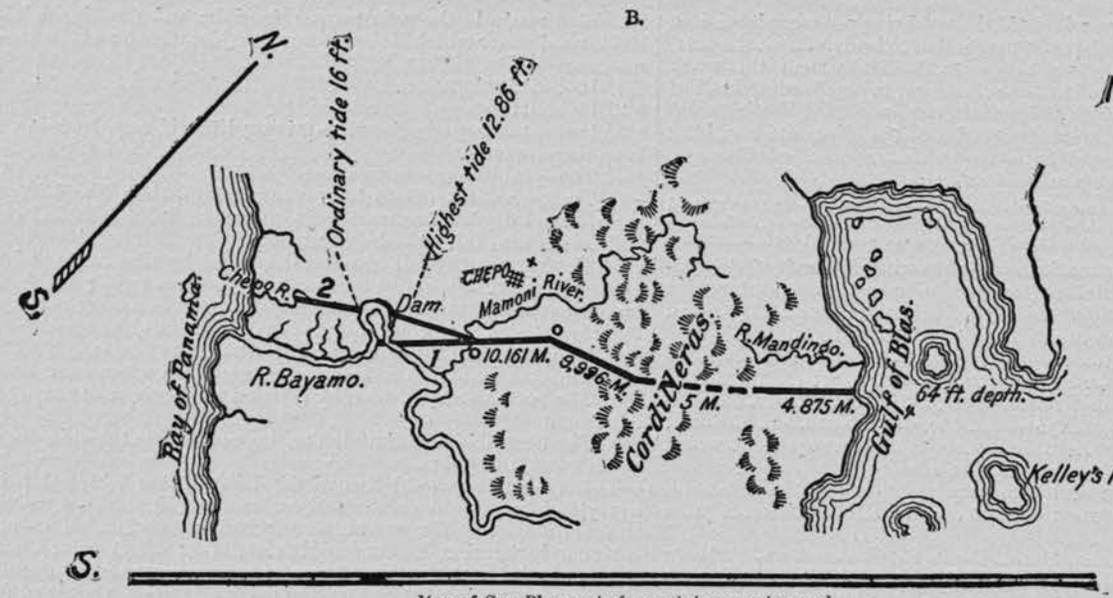
Engineering skill in tunnel construction has greatly advanced, and the price paid for such work is about half the contract price of twenty years ago.

Comparing the Hoosac, Mount Cenis, St. Gothard, and Arlberg tunnels, we find that the Arlberg, the latest, while one-third longer than the Hoosac, cost $2,700,000 less, and was built in one quarter of the time. The Hoosac tunnel to-day could probably be built for one-half of its original cost. (See Appendix, note 8.)



You have only to look at the sky-scraping buildings of the present day; the great bridges, and especially the one about to be thrown over the St. Lawrence at Montreal, and to cost $10,000,000; the Croton Aqueduct, the rock excavation work of which averaged about $2 per cubic yard; the Chicago Drainage Canal; the rapid transit tunnel now in course of construction in New York, and you will there find engineering problems as many and as difficult as any that will be encountered in the construction of the San Blas tunnel. I believe such a tunnel can be and should be driven. If it be impossible, I want to be told so by modern engineers and contractors competent to pass upon this matter, who will use modern methods and figures in working out a cost price. Until I feel that I have been thoroughly informed, and that in the light of that information I am wrong, I will believe that the San Blas route is the only proper, feasible, and practicable sea-level canal route which deserves our considerations, and for these reasons:

1. Its healthy location.
2. Its shortness.
3. Its magnificent harbors, requiring little if any dredging to keep them open.
4. The total absence of locks.
5. The possibility of working gangs of men night and day in the wet and dry seasons, and sheltering them from heat and rain and fevers that follow those conditions.
6. The very important consideration that by this route and no other sailing vessels could be towed by electric power and complete the passage in ten hours, by night as well as by day, whereas by other routes they could not pass at all or could be towed only by steam at great cost and in not less than fifty hours.
7. The economical maintenance of this canal when completed.
8. The permanency of its rock bed and the absence of earth embankment.
9. The desirable fact that it can be constructed within three, or, at most, five years.



This resolution would secure the information which I think every Senator desires on the subject, and would finally settle this tunnel question. We would have it before us when we are considering legislation looking to the building of an interoceanic canal. It does not call for a large appropriation, and I appeal to the business sense of Senators to pass it. Fifteen thousand dollars is less than one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the sum we may have to appropriate for the construction of an interoceanic canal. No Senator would hesitate to spend this small sum of money in any private undertaking involving even an outlay of a million dollars if thereby he could secure information that might point out a better plan of business procedure, or indicate a different method to be pursued in the conduct of his enterprise. I seriously believe that the sum called for by this appropriation will enable us to procure such reliable data concerning a tunnel canal route that Senators will be in position to consider the advisability of adopting such a route, or may dismiss it entirely from their consideration, conscious that they have endeavored to get the best information obtainable on the subject and have found it adverse to such a route. I wish to be convinced of the practicability or impracticability of a ship tunnel, and I submit the resolution as a business proposition and ask for it your serious consideration.

VARIOUS CANAL ROUTES PROPOSED.

(1) Tehuantepec, (2) Honduras, (3) Nicaragua, with five variations; (4) Panama, with four distinct routes, including San Blas route, 30 miles long; (5) Darien, with four distinct routes.

The routes considered by the Royal Geographical Society at its meeting in 1879 (see Bulletin, vol. 11) were as follows: (1) Tehuantepec, (2) Nicaragua, (3) Panama, (4) San Blas, (5) Caledonia Bay, (6) Atrato-Tuyra, (7) Atrato, Carcarica, and Tuyra, (8) Truando River, (9) Atrato and Cupico Bay, (10) Atrato to the Chiriqui Bay.

Mr. S. T. Abert, C. E., in his pamphlet, Is a Ship Canal Possible? says:

"To connect the Atrato with the Pacific by a canal without locks, there would be 95 miles of river navigation and 52½ miles of canal, making an aggregate length of 147½ miles."

[Note 2.]

Maj. Sidney F. Shelbourne stated in 1879, and before the American Geographical Society, that:

"San Blas Harbor has a depth of 112 feet, and as you pass inside toward the territory between the delta of the Rio Mandingo, you have a depth of 30 feet within 900 feet of the shore. The bottom of the harbor is clay and stiff mud, affording excellent holding ground. The Mandingo Harbor, embracing an area of about 9 square miles, is intended to be the Atlantic terminus of the San Blas Interoceanic Canal route. The harbor on the Pacific side is deep, sheltered, and commodious. The Atlantic side terminus would be in latitude 90° 26′ north, and longitude 70° 2′ west. The first section of the canal would be 4 miles of open cutting in a generally southwesterly direction; then would follow a tunnel of 7 miles through the Cordilleras, varying but little from a meridian of longitude, terminating in the Pacific slope of the range about half a mile east of the falls of Salto. From this point the canal would be by open cutting 12 miles into the Rio Bayano at its great bend, a point 6 miles from the bay of Panama; thence 6 miles along the river to the harbor."

[Note 3.]

M. Lucien de Puydt, in a paper read before the Royal Geographical Society January 13, 1868, said:

"I considered the Isthmus of Darien was the point wherein the nucleus of vibration of that vast upheaval was established which elevated from the depths of the earth the immense chain of the Cordilleras to the north and the Andes to the south, and if that hypothesis be correct, the inconsiderable altitude of the mountains on that point would be attributable to the quasi immobility of the Isthmus itself."

Transactions of the American Society of Civil Engineers, Vol. IX, 1880.

Mr. Walton W. Evans, discussing the San Blas route, said:

"1. I have served seven years as an engineer in the construction of canals.

"2. I have had experience in the construction of public works of forty-two years.

"3. I have crossed the Isthmus many times, partly by foot, by mule, by canal, and by rail.

"4. I have been detained on the Isthmus for weeks by rains, revolutions, and want of transportation before railways were built.

"5. I have witnessed the heavens open their flood gates and seen the terrible washings the railways were subjected to.

"6. I have lived in earthquake countries for eleven years and have witnessed the convulsions of nature on the Isthmus, as well as in Peru and Chile.

"7. I have for over thirty years made a study of this most interesting problem of cutting a canal for the largest ships through the narrow strip that divides North from South America.

"8. I have read with care most of the public documents in reference to it, and I am clearly of the opinion that the San Blas route for a sea-level canal is very preferable to the Nicaraguan route, with locks, or any other route ever reported on.

"9. I beg to present some axioms in reference to this great problem.

"First. A canal 30 miles long is preferable to one 181½ miles long.

"Second. A canal without locks is preferable to one with locks.

"Third. A canal that has great harbors at its termini is preferable to one with no harbors at either end.

"Fourth. A canal built in a healthy region is preferable to one in an unhealthy region.

"Fifth. A canal that can be navigated in ten hours is better than one requiring one hundred hours.

"Sixth. A canal that will call for very small repairs is preferable to one requiring immense repairs.

"Seventh. A canal that has a small watershed but sure supply of water is preferable to a canal having a great watershed.

"Eighth. A canal that is not on a line of danger is preferable to one on a line of danger.

"Ninth. A canal that can pass a ship of any length is preferable to one that limits the length to far below that of existing ships.

"Tenth. A canal that is virtually a straight line is preferable to one with curves, some of them very objectionable. De Lesseps said to me in Paris, 'There is one point in this matter we must observe: Wherever the canal is built, it must be a sea-level canal.'"

Mr. Owen May, an engineer of high repute, said, in discussing the feasibility of a canal across the Isthmus:

"1. I would make a complete survey of these two routes, the Caledonia and the San Blas route, to find which was best as to length of tunnels and other points, such as harbors and drainage.

"2. If I found the San Blas route the best of the two I would buy the Panama Railway and its concessions of all kinds.

"3. I would get a concession from the Colombian Government allowing me to build a canal.

"4. I would locate a direct straight line on the shortest route from San Blas to the Pacific Ocean.

"5. I would send for M. Favre (since dead), contractor of the St. Gothard tunnel, who has more experience in great tunnels than any man living, and make a contract with him, or some engagement for the use of his brains and experience.

"6. I would call together a committee of merchants, shipowners, and engineers to decide on the dimensions of the canal and tunnel.

"7. I would drive the work night and day until it was completed, and then open it for the benefit of the world.

"8. I would call on the Governments of England, France, and the United States to guarantee the bonds of the company, these Governments to become the owners of the canal at the end of one hundred years, they paying the original cost as determined by a board of their own during construction.

"9. I would insist on the whole work being completed within eight years.

"The leading advantages of the route were stated to be:

"a. It has fine harbors at its termini.

"b. It is the only feasible sea-level route known.

"c. It is the shortest and not an unhealthy route."

Mr. Frederick M. Kelley, who spent twenty-seven years of his life and nearly if not all of his fortune in an endeavor to discover a sea-level canal route, at a meeting of the American Geographic Society in New York in 1879, said:

"My efforts have been to find a canal route practically without locks, and I believe that the San Blas route is the best of all, because it is the shortest. Ships should be enabled to go through on a fair keel. They require good harbors, with no necessity of dredging to keep them open. Ship captains and shipping merchants in this country are all agreed in that respect. On the San Blas route the total distance throughout is about 30 miles. Ten miles of the Rio Bayana is suitable, with a little improvement, for navigation, and of the remaining 20 miles 7 is a tunnel. The question is not so much one of cost as one of commerce and facilities for use. What are thirty or fifty millions, more or less, in a work of this kind, which is to last forever and accommodate the expanding needs of trade? There is a great deal in having a canal that will be easy to maintain. A tunnel 80 feet wide at water surface and 120 feet high above the canal bottom to crown of arch is sufficient. A ship can pass this route in ten hours, towed at the rate of 3 miles an hour. To pass the Nicaragua route at the same rate of speed would require sixty-four hours."

[Copy of a letter from Mr. Frederick M. Kelly to the late Chief Justice Daly, president of the American Geographical Society, December 9, 1879. Am. Geographical Soc., Bulletin 4.]

No. 153 WEST FORTY-FIFTH STREET,
New York City, N. Y., December 7, 1879.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of November 26, inviting me to be present at the meeting of your society on the 9th instant to hear Admiral Ammen's Nicaragua Ship Canal paper read, I received in due time, with thanks, but on account of serious illness in my family I will not be able to attend. I would be very glad to see the admiral, as it was my great pleasure to make his acquaintance some years ago when in Washington, notwithstanding I have no confidence in the enterprise of which he is so zealous and able an advocate.

Twenty-seven years' study of the question and an extensive intercourse with men engaged in shipping interests in this country and Europe have convinced me that a short sea-level canal, with good, safe harbors, which will require no dredging or other improvements to keep open and which can be reached safely at all times on a wide, open sea, is what the commerce of the world demands and will have, sooner or later, cost what it may.

These important and necessary conditions the Nicaragua route does not afford, as it is 180 miles long, requiring 18 or 20 locks, so liable to get out of order in the wet isthmian climate, and with no good natural harbors on either ocean.

A canal via the San Blas route will give us a deep, wide cut through the narrowest part of the Isthmus through which vessels may pass from ocean to ocean quickly and safely on an even keel without expense, dangers, and delays of locks, save one tidal lock to control too high tide of the Pacific.

A ship at the rate of 3 miles per hour can be towed through the San Blas Canal in ten hours, and thus 100 going from the Atlantic to the Pacific and 100 from the Pacific to the Atlantic—200 ships—could pass the Isthmus at this narrow point in twenty-four hours with perfect ease. The same ship going at the same speed would require seventy hours to pass the Nicaragua Canal, including delays at its numerous locks, any one of which, if disabled, would detain the ship no one can tell how long, perhaps weeks or months. It would be a great misfortune to build a long, many-lock canal like the Nicaragua, as that would result in constructing another one at the narrowest part of the Isthmus. The San Blas route, surveyed by Messrs. McDougal, Sweet, Foreman, Rude, and Fountain in 1864 and partially examined by Commander Selfridge in 1871, is but 30 miles long, of which 10 miles is the Bayano River, easily, for a trifling expense, made navigable for ships, thus leaving only 20 miles for canalization of this route, 7 miles of which is a tunnel which the engineering skill of this day, with steam and crompressed-air drills now in use, can drive without serious difficulties the same as they have the Hoosac, Mont Cenis, St. Gotthard, and other tunnels in this country and Europe, which twenty-five years ago, with the old mode of tunnel drilling, would have been impracticable.

In attempting to solve so great a problem as the best and only route for a ship canal, it is important that additional surveys should be made, especially of the San Blas route, which is much the shortest of all proposed, as by this means a lower and shorter pass will doubtless be found by flanking the sugar-loaf hills which extend through that part of the Isthmus.

The party should be in charge of a competent Army engineer like General Michler, who in 1858, by order of Congress, made a very creditable and able survey of the Atrato-Truando route for a canal without locks, via the Atrato Valley.

As we are building the canal for all time, it is the height of folly to locate it where dangerous floods and almost bottomless swamps will destroy it, and thus render useless the undertaking which has cost millions of money.

The safest and most reliable material to excavate in that country is rock, and the more miles of rock the canal passes through the more safe and durable will be the structure, and less walling will be required to keep the banks from falling in, and the less will be the cost of maintenance after the work is finished.

Of about 30,000,000 cubic yards of material to be removed on the San Blas route (which is much less than other routes, excepting the Atrato-Napipi) about 25,000,000 is rock, and hence the canal located there would be more safe and solid and cost very much less to maintain it in the future.

This in the long run of years is of very great importance to the stockholders, as every railroad man in the country fully comprehends. If it cost all the receipts to maintain the work, where will the shareholders get their dividends? I have had careful estimates made by the engineers employed, and the total estimate of the cost of the canal is $104,000,000. The estimate of the cost of the tunnel 80 feet wide at the water line and 120 feet high from the bottom of the canal is $54,000,000.

Yours, very truly, FREDERICK M. KELLEY.

Mr. J. Dutton Steele, who had large experience in tunneling in Pennsylvania, in referring to the same matter, wrote to Admiral Selfridge as follows:

"I have carefully considered the important subject to which your letter refers, viz, the probable cost of the tunnel, and have concluded that the figures you give are as nearly correct as possible. Such work could be let to good men in the United States for from 10 to 20 per cent under these prices, but the cost of moving men and machinery (plant) to a new field of operations will increase the cost."

Mr. S. A. Scott, a prominent engineer of the Erie Canal, who was also on a survey on the San Blas route in 1857, says:

"There seems to be no objection to this route; in fact it looks more practicable than any other with which I am acquainted."

All of these opinions were given when the cost of tunneling was much greater than it is now, and the machinery and engineering methods employed in their construction much inferior to our present-day standard.

Admiral Selfridge's figures and comments on the Napipi route, so far as it involves the construction of a tunnel, were as follows:

"Division No. 3 extends from V to Y and is a tunnel 9,010 yards in length, 120 feet high, and 70 feet wide. Its sides are perpendicular for 63 feet, the remainder an arch with a depth of 57 feet. The number of square yards in a linear section of a tunnel of these dimensions is 824. For estimate of cost of this work, supposing arch to be self-sustaining, an allowance of $5.35 per cubic yard is made, which puts the whole cost of division No. 3 at $39,719,684. * * *

"There appears to be a popular prejudice against tunnels, difficult to understand in the face of the success of the Mont Cenis Tunnel and the undoubted completion of the Hoosac Tunnel in a couple of years; for though this tunnel is of much greater dimensions, still it is not entirely a tunnel in a tunneler's sense of the term. Bore a hole 15 feet high, and the remainder should be treated as an open cut, with the favorable exception of a roof overhead.

"A few years ago such a work would have been an impossibility, but with the modern improvements in drills and explosives it is a matter of only time and money.

"With the Burleigh drill, which can bore a 2-inch hole in hard rock in seven minutes, and calculated to be equal to the work of 60 men with the common hand drill, and with the employment of nitro-glycerin, or picrate powder, which has an explosive force seven times greater than gunpowder, a condemnation of this line should not be made on account of a tunnel, except on the ground of cost, which is amply met by the small expenditure in other portions of the work." And in referring again to tunnel work, he says: "In the construction of a canal over any route whatever there will arise great obstacles and delays on account of the very heavy rainfall, increasing materially the cost of construction, for which no proper estimate can be made; but the Napipi line is free, in a considerable measure, from this serious inconvenience, for work in the tunnel can be carried on uninterruptedly, night and day, in the wet as well as in the dry season."

That eminent engineer, Charles E. Sweet, who made a survey of this route in 1864, says the nature of the material through which excavation is to be made is substantially the primitive rock and of so substantial a character that no provision for lining is necessary. He thinks it would require from six to eight years to construct the canal, and submits the following estimate, September 13, 1879:

"Total length, 30.3 miles. Commencing at the west or Pacific side, the Bayano River can be made available for canal purposes at a nominal cost. The depth of cutting at the west end of tunnel would be 150 feet and the distance is 8.99 miles. The summit of the Cordillera Range, penetrated by a tunnel, is 1,500 feet above sea level. The formation is principally trap and granite, and the tunnel will probably need no lining. The dimensions of the canal proposed, outside of the tunnel, are 100 feet wide on bottom, 125 feet wide at surface, and 28 feet deep.

"The tunnel section would be 70 feet wide at bottom, with batter 1 to 12 outward to the spring of a gothic arch. The total height of the tunnel would be 118 feet from bottom of canal to crown of arch. The sections contain 845 square yards, or 282 cubic yards per linear foot." In estimating the cost of construction Mr. Sweet assumed a heading of 243 square feet at $20 per cubic yard, and figured the removal of bottom at $5 per cubic yard. This amounted to $1,545 per linear foot. He estimated that it would cost an additional $865.88 per linear foot of tunnel to line it throughout. The detail estimate is as follows:

Lighthouse at Chepillo Island	$12,000
Removal of bars in Pacific and Bayano River	136,684
Tidal lock at Great Bend	675,844
Dam across river at Great Bend	174,631
Cut at Great Bend	209,835
New channel for Mamori River	115,752
Canal to south end of tunnel	13,033,943
Tunnel, 7 miles long	57,103,200
Canal to Gulf of San Blas	11,234,318
Lock, 9 feet lift, at San Blas	506,017
Light-house at Butlers Point	12,000
Engineering contingencies	20,803,556
Total estimated cost	104,017,780
If tunnel requires lining, add	32,002,181

Charles Prelini, in his Practical Treatise on Tunneling, published in 1901, gives the following table of cost for excavation in different kind of soils, based on his examination of the actual cost of constructing many different tunnels through formations of like character, the number of which is given:

Nature of soils.	Number of tunnels.	Cost per cubic yard.
Granite gneiss	56	$3.07 to $3.85
Schist	39	1.38 to 1.53
Triassic	3
Jurassic	69	1.23 to 1.38
Cretaceous	34	.61 to .77
Tertiary and modern	39	.33 to .61

[Note 8.]

An examination of the cost of the four great tunnels of the world—Hoosac, Mont Cenis, St. Gotthard, and Arlberg—discloses the engineering fact that the Arlberg, while one-third larger than the Hoosac, cost $2,700,000 less and was built in one-quarter of the time. The Hoosac to-day could probably be built for one-half of the cost of its construction. Their relative cost per foot was:

Hoosac	$379
Mont Cenis	356
St. Gotthard	229
Arlberg	154

In Van Nostrand's Engineering Magazine, volume 1, 1869, may be found an estimate of the work to be done on the Hoosac Tunnel and the contract price for doing it.

Three miles were to be excavated, one and three-fourths of its length of 4½ miles having been constructed. It was to be 24 feet clear and 20 feet wide. Eight drills were to be used to a heading 8 feet high, with not less than 50 pounds air pressure. Four and one-half million of bricks were to be used for arching, and the price was to be $4,594,268. That tunnel could be built for $2,500,000 to-day. Multiplying the contract price by ten and again by three a tunnel 9 miles long and 240 feet clear and 200 feet wide will result, and the cost of its construction would be approximately $137,828,040. These figures would apply only to the days of the Burleigh drill and gunpowder and nitroglycerine. The cost to-day would be about one-half.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the joint resolution may lie upon the table, and at some future time I shall call it up for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the joint resolution may continue to lie upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN. Before there is any action taken upon that request I want to move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to make a statement about that, Mr. President, if I have the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to the reference, except the delay which it will cause. I do not believe it will require over two months to execute the joint resolution, but, of course, it will cause additional delay if it is referred to the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], that General Serrell, who is the promoter of this project of a canal at San Blas, appeared before the committee, and asked that the subject might be referred to a subcommittee for investigation. Thereupon a subcommittee was appointed, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] was appointed the chairman of it. He has heard General Serrell and he has heard other persons. He is conducting as rapidly as he can an investigation of this subject at the instance of General Serrell. The Senator from Kansas is particularly well fitted for that work, because he and his father have had personal experience there as engineers in the survey of the San Blas route, besides other routes lying below Panama.

The committee has been very diligent in bringing forward all the information possible to be obtained on the very subject on which the Senator from West Virginia has addressed the Senate, and will not allow the grass to grow under its feet on that subject. So that if this resolution goes to that committee it will at once receive the consideration that it deserves; and no one pretends that it does not deserve very careful consideration. But there are questions connected with it besides the mere engineering questions which the Senate will at once perceive the importance of.

The Republic of Colombia includes Panama and all the proposed canal lines south of that State. It has stock in the Panama Canal to the amount of a million dollars, if not more—certainly a million dollars; it has very large contingent interests in the earnings of the Panama Canal, and it also has an interest, and a very great one, in the Panama Railroad Company, from which it derives an income of $275,000 a year, and, of course, leaving the Panama Railroad to stand there, we may expect a good deal of embarrassment and a good deal of hesitation on the part of Colombia to our acquiring the right to build a competing line that will destroy both the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad. So that that question stands in front of all questions in regard to the San Blas route, even if it were the best one for the canal. If that can be demonstrated, Mr. President, this other question stands in front of it, and it is, it seems to me, an entirely hopeless task to get Colombia to consent to destroy the Panama Canal, and also the Panama Railroad, in order to have this sea-level canal through the Isthmus at San Blas.

But the Senate, I think, will see at once that these questions are all tied together in such a way as that they can not give intelligent consideration to any one route—Nicaragua, Panama, San Blas, or any other—without considering all of them; and it has been the object of the committee to bring before the Senate fully and fairly every fact that can bear upon the whole question for or against either of these routes. The committee, I think, is competent to present a thing of that sort.

I wish to say, in addition, Mr. President, a few words, and to put into the RECORD some papers which I have collected here. It will take me only a few minutes to do so if the Senate will indulge me.

The advantages and disadvantages of the routes through which an isthmian canal could be built have been discussed since immemorial times, and it is instructive and interesting to consider the opinions of travelers, geographers, explorers, and engineers who have given attention to and have made a thorough study of this subject covering a period of more than a century.

The unanimity of opinions in favor of the Nicaragua route is evident and dispels any doubt as to the advantages of that route over any possible canal line in America.

The following quotations are arranged chronologically and show a close study of the subject in all its bearings by men and journals of established reputation in different nations and at different periods.

No great question in which all nations are concerned has ever been so carefully examined by diligent students, and none has been settled by so general a concensus of enlightened opinion.

I will place in the RECORD, with the consent of the Senate, quotations, without comment, from these various writers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama, and the papers referred to by him will be inserted in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

THE ROUTE OF THE CANAL.

BASTIDE, M DE LA. Memoire sur la possibilité, les avantages, et les moyens d'ouvrir un canal dans l'Amérique Septentrionale. Paris, 1791.

Page 9:

"From what we have stated about the three points, the easiest to execute the scheme of communication, it can be concluded that preference must be given without hesitation to the Rio San Juan."

Page 10:

"No other place in America presents so many advantages as the Lake of Nicaragua, etc., and, lastly, this lake would be an immense port capable of containing all the navies of the world."

HUMBOLDT, BARON. Ensayo Politoco sobre el Reyno de Nuevo Espana. Madrid, 1818.

Page 240:

"The bar of the Rio San Juan, on the eastern coast of Nicaragua, has 12 feet of water; on one point only there is a narrow pass of 25 feet deep. In the Rio San Juan there is from 4 to 6 fathoms, and in the Lake of Nicaragua from 3 to 8, English measure. The Rio San Juan is navigable for brigs and sloops. Mr. Davis Robinson also says: 'The western coast of Nicaragua is not so stormy as it was represented to me during my navigation in the South Sea, and a canal issuing at Panama would have the great disadvantage of being continued at a distance of 2 leagues in the sea, because there are only some feet of water as far as the isles Flamenco and Perico.'"

Page 245:

"The Isthmus of Nicaragua has always appeared to me the most favorable for the formation of a canal of large dimensions. * * * In considering communication between two seas capable of producing a revolution in the commercial world, we must not limit our attention to establish a system of inland navigation by small locks, as in the canals of Languedoc, etc."

Pages 269-270:

"Being guided in the practical views, presented at the end of this chapter, only by the analogy of the labors already performed by man, I shall first observe that the breadth of the Isthmus of Nicaragua, in which the height of the ridge of partition is very inconsiderable, is nearly the same as the breadth of the land crossed by the artificial part of the Caledonian Canal. The Isthmus of Nicaragua, by the position of its inland lake and the communication of that lake with the Atlantic by the Rio San Juan, presents several features of resemblance with that neck of land in the Scotch Highlands where the river Ness forms a natural communication between the mountain lakes and the Gulf of Murray. At Nicaragua, as in the Scotch Highlands, there would be but one narrow ridge to pass over; for if the Rio San Juan, in a great part of its course, is from 30 to 40 feet deep, as is asserted, it would require to be rendered navigable in some parts by means of lateral channels."

Page 275:

"Regarding Panama.—We think that more advantageous ports may be chosen; but we ought here to observe that the height of the ridge is an insuparable obstacle to the junction of the seas, when there is not at the same time a sufficient quantity of upper water fit to be conveyed to the point of partition."

Page 282:

"The Lake of Nicaragua may serve as an upper basin, like the Lake Oich in the Caledonian Canal, and regulating sluices will furnish as much water for the canal as it requires."

a water communication already exists between the two oceans, with the exception of the narrow space between the west side of Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific, sometimes called the Isthmus of Nicaragua."

FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW. Proposed ship canal across the American Isthmus. (Vol. 34.) London, 1845.

Pages 395-396:

"By far the greater part of this space is occupied by Lakes Leon and Nicaragua, the deep river Tipitapa, which flows from the former into the latter, and the ample bed of the San Juan, by which the Lake of Nicaragua pours its waters into the Atlantic. The resemblance between this noble body of water and the chain of lakes which has been converted into the Caledonian Canal can not be overlooked, and the probability seems strong, on a first view, that nature has here laid down the basis of a great oceanic communication which invites the fashioning hand of man to complete it."

BAILY, JOHN. Central America. London, 1850.

Page 132:

"In contemplating the opening of a ship canal in the State of Nicaragua, the river San Juan becomes an object of the highest importance, as seeming to present the natural and available means for effecting that great enterprise."

Page 147:

"At one extremity of the canal of Nicaragua there would be the port of San Juan in the Atlantic, which presents as many conveniences as would be required. It may be entered at all seasons and in all weathers without risk. The anchorage is good in 4 or 5 fathoms of water, nor is there any danger within it; therefore it could be made one of the termini of the canal without incurring much expense for the improvement as a port."

Page 244:

"Regarding Panama.—Panama will always be a passenger line. Of that there can be no doubt; but, without something more being ascertained than is yet known, can never become the water line of communication between the two oceans.

"Regarding Nicaragua.—The great and prominent feature in this line is the inexhaustible reservoir of water to supply any amount of lockage, which nature has created and placed, as if on purpose to facilitate the enterprise, in the great lakes of Nicaragua and Managua, at present affording a natural but imperfect route to the Atlantic, reducing the main difficulty to the passage of the Lake of Nicaragua to the Pacific."

WALKER, Gen. W. Destiny of Nicaragua. Boston, 1856.

Page 37:

"The Nicaragua route offers as many inducements as any now known. San Juan, on the Atlantic side, is a town, upon the river of that name, with which we have an extended commerce."

"The greatest advantages in the Nicaragua route are the ease with which it may be traveled and the certainty of proceeding with comfort and safety."

SQUIER, E. G. The States of Central America. New York, 1858.

Page 416:

"From what has been said it sufficiently appears that Nicaragua is a country of great beauty of scenery and vast natural resources. She has, however, attracted the attention of the world less on this account than because she is believed to possess within her borders the best and most feasible route for a ship canal between the two great oceans. The project of opening such a canal began to be entertained as soon as it was found that there existed no natural communication between the seas—as early as 1527. Since that period it has furnished a subject for much speculation, but beyond a few partial examinations until very lately nothing of a practical or satisfactory character has been attained."

Page 436:

"Opinions of English engineers.—The American minister in England, at the request of the company, appears to have transmitted Colonel Childs's surveys to the Earl of Malmesbury with a wish that he would submit it to competent English engineers for their opinion. James Walker, esq., civil engineer, and Edouard Aldrich, captain of the royal engineers, were named for this service. They seem not only to have examined Col. Childs's survey, but to have subjected that gentleman, who was then in England, to a very close personal examination. Taking his plans, measurements, and statements to be correct, their opinion is, on the whole, favorable."

"Nicaragua.—The greatest scheme of Central American canalization which has ever been advocated is that passing through Nicaragua, where the comparative facilities for forming a magnificent canal for ships of the largest size admit no dispute."

"The strongest claim for a final survey of the Nicaragua route for a transit suited to the wants of the age are the water communications of the central lakes and their ability to feed the remaining line of the canal."

"Professor Nourse says in conclusion: 'There is this encouraging fact to those who have hoped of the Nicaragua route as securing early a ship canal, that both Colonel Childs and several of his assistants, in 1851 and 1852, have confidently believed that a practicable route can and will here be found.'"

"Nicaragua.—Is more renowned for the importance of building the interoceanic canal than for a railroad. "Nicaragua.—This line has been favorably known and appears to possess advantages which can not be claimed for another.

"The lake receives the waters of forty rivers, as well as the overflow of the higher and smaller Lake Managua.

"If locks are allowed at all, the Lake of Nicaragua would appear to present advantages possessed by none of the others."

TACKELS, C. J. Percement de l'Isthme de Panama ou de celui du Nicaragua. Brussels, 1880.

Page 38:

"We must state frankly that we do not like to follow Mr. Lesseps's ideas, due to the above-mentioned reasons, while we are greatly in favor of the scheme of piercing the Isthmus of Nicaragua."

Page 39:

"In the Nicaragua Lake scheme we have a distance of 291 kilometers, it is true, but one is almost always in an open sea. Navigation is therefore a facility to compensate with distance; and it must be added that Nicaragua is at a distance of more than 600 leagues from the Gulf of Panama. It can be said with certainty of not being contradicted that there is economy in this scheme from any standpoint that the matter is considered.

"Thus from one end to the other of the canal toward the Lake of Nicaragua, with the San Juan River canalized, ships will be able to navigate and to cross each other, by day or night, at full speed without the inconveniences of stops or stations. There is no other delay than the passage of the locks, and it can be computed in seven hours only.

"Consequently all advantages are in favor of piercing the canal by the Lake of Nicaragua, and this fact induces us to prefer this route."

AMMEN, Rear-Admiral D. American Isthmus Routes. Philadelphia, 1889.

Page 10 (Senate Executive Document No. 15, Forty-sixth Congress, first session):

"That the Nicaragua route, being on the Atlantic side, at or near Greytown, possesses, both for the construction and maintenance of a canal, greater advantages and offers fewer difficulties from engineering, commercial, and economic points of view than any one of the other routes shown to be practicable by surveys sufficient in detail to enable a judgment to be formed of their respective merits, as will be briefly presented in an accompanying memorandum."

Page 13: In the North American Review of February, 1881, will be found a long paper by General Grant to the National Congress, which closed as follows:

"I have formed the opinions expressed in this article not from a hasty consideration of the subject and not without personal observation. While commanding the Army of the United States my attention was drawn to the importance of the water communication that I have discussed. During my administration of the Government I endeavored to impress upon the country the views I had then formed, and I shall feel that I have added one more fact of my life to those I have already recorded if I shall succeed in impressing upon Congress and the people the high value, as a commercial and industrial enterprise, of this great work, which, if not accomplished by Americans, will undoubtedly be accomplished by some of our rivals in power and influence."

Page 19:

"Much that I have said would have little relevancy to isthmian transit were it not that it shows beyond question that the impediments in the way of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal have not been of a physical nature, but vile machinations, which yet continue. In March, 1887, when Eads was expending his dying efforts in opposing the passage of an act of incorporation for the Nicaragua Canal Company and Mr. Colné, the secretary of the American syndicate to maintain the neutrality of the Government through its annuity of $500,000, was in Washington, doubtless to aid in preventing the passage of the bill, Colné gave out a telegram received from Paris, that M. de Lesseps would be gratified to see the Nicaragua Canal constructed."

Page 27:

"We may turn with satisfaction from the wretchedly conceived and mismanaged affairs at Panama to the idea of the great Humboldt, who visited the continent ninety years ago. Seventy-five years ago he wrote upon 'The practicability of a water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans;' to be found in his personal narrative, published in London in 1826" (already quoted).

Page 28:

"On the Atlantic side, where the sea-level canal to the first lock will be 11 miles, there is a diurnal tide of only 20 inches. Were it 20 feet, as at Panama, it would require a tide lock to prevent scour and deposits. The country is entirely flat, and the heavy embankments of the material excavated, flumed to 100 yards or more from the line of canal, will make the surface drainage actually only that which falls in the area. This is a marked contrast with the great surface drainage that would damage every mile of the Panama Canal."

Page 29:

"In the construction of the Nicaragua Canal there is a deep rock cut nearly 3 miles long near Greytown. A good part of the material will be required to construct a considerable mole at the entrance at Greytown and a dam at Ochoa.

"That the Nicaragua Canal will be constructed, and without delay, is assured by these facts, which tell not the less why the Panama Canal was a failure and will never be completed.

"The Engineering News referred to makes an admirable comparison of the two canal routes, as follows: 'At Nicaragua there is no unsolvable Chagres River problem; there is much less canal excavation; there is much less deep cutting; there is no problem of water supply; there is no rotten sliding rock; there are no endemic pestilences; there is a stiff trade breeze blowing all the year round to maintain health and comfort; there is a prior knowledge from detail surveys of just what is to be done, which was wholly lacking at Panama; there is the advantage of all the experience gained at Panama.'"

AMMEN, Rear-Admiral D. The Old Navy and the New. Philadelphia, 1891.

Page 474:

"In 1872 I was the junior member of a commission appointed by the President to examine into and report upon the canal question.

"The commission made its final report February 7, 1876, one sentence of which is as follows:

"'That the route known as the "Nicaragua route" possesses both for the construction and maintenance of a canal greater advantages and offers fewer difficulties from engineering, commercial, and economic points of view than any other of the other routes shown to be practicable by surveys sufficiently in detail to enable a judgment to be formed of their relative merits, as will be briefly presented in the appended memorandum.'"

Page 475:

"In February, 1879, M. de Lesseps informed our Government that he desired a convocation of engineers and representatives of all nationalities to meet at Paris on the 15th of May to discuss the American isthmian canal question. President Hayes sent for me a month later and said he wished me to attend this so-called 'congress' under instructions from the State Department."

Page 476:

"The decision in favor of a sea-level canal at Panama was really momentous and unfortunate for M. de Lesseps and his future stockholders.

"Had he chosen Nicaragua, in all probability at that time he could have obtained a concession, and ere this would have completed the canal and his stockholders would have been the envy of the world."

Page 477:

"General Grant arrived in San Francisco from Japan on the 28th of September, 1879, and from that time on was beset by a number of influences all calculated to draw him away from his cherised purpose of contributing to the extent of his ability to the construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

"The railroad magnates said: 'If you will only go to Mexico and promote the construction of an international railroad you will achieve the great possible good.' He was induced to go to Mexico as much to thwart the construction of the Nicaragua Canal as to promote the railroad constructions."

Page 480:

"In the meantime M. de Lesseps was gaining his experience from the operations, that the engineering difficulties at Panama were far more formidable than had been anticipated in making a canal, whether at the level of the sea or without any lockage that might be proposed. Then we find Mr. Blanchet in Nicaragua again, of whom mention has been made before as an emissary of M. de Lesseps in Nicaragua."

Page 481:

"There were many reasons at that time for my belief that Mr. Blanchet was in Nicaragua as a covert agent of M. de Lesseps."

Page 490:

"Notwithstanding the powerful influences that have stood in the way of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal and the consequent delays, the continued surveys have made the project of its development highly satisfactory.

"No waterway in the globe is so munificently supplied with a constant water level or so well protected against the damaging effects of the floods through weirs to discharge the surplusage, and all this, too, will be effected with a greatly reduced cost in the construction. The canal prism is reduced by these means to a length of less than 28 miles, one-half or even more of which can be dug by dredging machines."

Page 492:

"Had Baron Humboldt lived until his ideas had assumed a tangible form, in the actual location of the Nicaragua Canal, he would have seen the great lake, 110 feet above the sea level, with a considerable part of its bottom below the level of the sea, spread out to within less than 4 miles from the free waters of the Pacific, and within about 10 miles of the Atlantic, with low ground intervening—not in the valley of a stream, but simply in flat land—presenting no obstacle to dredging nor any difficulty in keeping the channel clear when the work is completed."

JOHNSON. Page 133:

"The Nicaragua Canal is as much an inland waterway of the United States, as regards a large part of the commercial service it will perform, as it would be were it to extend across the country from New York to San Francisco.

"The waterway will be an equally important route for the movement of our coastwise traffic, as distinct from the strictly inland traffic. It will be, as President Hayes said, 'Virtually a part of the coast line of the United States.' Besides this, it will become an important highway for the foreign commerce of our own country and the other nations of the world."

COLQUHOUN, A. R. The Nicaragua Canal. Westminster, 1895.

Page 6:

"Referring to Panama.—The adoption of the lock system, forced upon him by dire necessity, was unpalatable to Lesseps, more especially on account of the views he had expressed on the proposed Nicaragua Canal, for it must be mentioned as a singular fact that Lesseps in his 'Souvenirs,' as well as elsewhere, actually expressed the opinion that 'It was very clear the Nicaragua Canal was the best of canals with locks, if one were compelled to adopt that system.'"

Page 12:

"This object could never be accomplished at Panama, with the channel bed at sea level. Neither is a lock canal, in my opinion, possible, for a canal with locks or lifts must have at its highest level an abundant, safe, and controllable supply of water, and this can only be had in Central America on the Nicaragua route. There it already exists in perfection."

Page 16:

"It is possible, both for the construction and maintenance of a canal, greater advantages and fewer difficulties from engineering, commercial, and economic points of view than any of the other routes shown to be practicable by surveys, sufficiently in detail to enable a judgment to be formed of their relative merits. This opinion, based upon a long and careful study of the several route surveys across the continent, was signed by General Humphries, Chief of Engineers, Mr. Patterson, Superintendent of Coast Survey, and Commodore Ammen, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation."

Page 38:

"To demonstrate the thorough nature of this investigation it is sufficient to mention the fact that, although the length of the artificial canal is less than 20 miles, the total distance actually surveyed by transit and level—in cross sectioning and the location of locks, embankments, railroads, flowage lines, etc.—through a most difficult country was not less than 4,000. At every 500 yards careful borings, with corresponding records, were made. The whole constitute an accumulation of scientific data probably unsurpassed in any other similar enterprise."

Page 141:

"Conclusions.—Nicaragua is free from the obstacles met with in other localities—high elevation in the Cordillera separating the two oceans, requiring tunneling, or a high summit level, requiring a large number of locks, for which an adequate water supply is not obtainable, or torrential streams, whose control within reasonable limits is beyond the skill of the engineer."

KEASBEY, L. M. The Nicaragua Canal. New York, 1896.

Page 595:

"Regarding Panama.—In adopting the Panama route we would simply be burning our strategical bridges behind us, and this would be little short of foolhardy, considering the nature of the contest before us.

"Regarding Nicaragua.—Under the circumstances, therefore, the Nicaragua route would seem to be our only choice from a political point of view, and it is indeed fortunate that the technical factors involved do not seriously militate against our necessity.

"The Nicaragua route offers some exceptional advantages, when judged thus from a purely strategical standpoint; and foremost among them is the magnificent fresh-water sea in the center, capable of accommodating an entire fleet if necessary, and rendering possible the reparation of injuries inflicted upon our vessels in the high seas."

Page 596:

"But even after our financial choice has been made in favor of the Nicaragua Canal there still remains the more pressing problem of establishing our political control along the route."

MCCORKLE, Governor W. A. The Nicaragua Canal. Richmond, 1896.

Page 128:

"Referring to Panama.—A friend of mine, a former manager of the Panama Railroad, informed me that in twenty-four hours he had seen the Chagres River raise 70 feet. It was attempted by De Lesseps to control this river, but it was found to be impracticable. The great canal engineer, wedded to his idea of the sea-level Suez Canal, depressed the bottom of the Panama Canal to the sea level. This intensified the terrible power of the torrential Chagres. In addition to all this, by reason of the tides on the Atlantic coast being only 1½ feet in height, while in the Pacific coast they have risen to 19 feet, it was seen that the locks would be necessary. There was no water to supply the summit level. Even the vigor and energy of the French nation wore out and the combat with nature was abandoned."

CRAIG, H. Pros and Cons. New York, 1897.

Page 148:

"Nicaragua.—We may never be called upon to test our valor or strength in a trial of arms, yet foreign aggressiveness may compel to resort to conflict, in which event this canal would be a short gateway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The possibilities of such a conflict are sufficient reason for us to insist on days of peace on a provision that may be immensely worth to us in days of war."

Page 54:

"In the interim other routes have been advocated, but careful surveys made by the United States Government demonstrated almost a decade before the disastrous attempt at Panama that the Nicaragua route was the only practicable one."

HARBORS.

Some comparisons have been made of the harbors of the Nicaraguan and Panama routes which might lead to the supposition that in Nicaragua they are entirely lacking and in Colombia all that could be desired. The Isthmian Canal Commission, after examining into this question, reports that Colon is not a good or safe harbor, and that during a blow ships must put to sea for safety.

The Isthmian Canal Commission estimates that the entrance and harbor at Colon will cost $8,057,707; Greytown entrance and harbor, $2,198,860; Brito, $1,509,470. Thus it is evident that the combined cost for harbors and entrances at Greytown and Brito amounts to $3,708,330. Therefore their aggregate cost is $4,349,377 less than the estimated cost for Colon alone.

On the other hand, S. T. Abert, in his historical and statistical note upon the projected routes for an interoceanic canal, published in Cincinnati in 1872, says in page 60: "On account of the rises of the tides, which vary as much as 22 feet, vessels are compelled to anchor 2½ miles from Panama and the passengers and freight are transported in light-draft steamers."

It is a most important fact that Lake Nicaragua, on the summit level, affords many good harbors wherein ships may rest in perfect safety; where dry docks can be conveniently built at small expense in which ships of all descriptions can be repaired and cleaned when necessary, and where shipyards can easily be established, due to the facility of having at hand in the rich and accessible forest surrounding Lake Nicaragua all the necessary woods for constructing vessels and an immense quantity of precious and hard woods, such as mahogany, cedar, lignum-vitæ, etc.

The fresh water of the lake would be of immense value for cleaning the vessels' bottoms because it rids them of barnacles.

MENLO PARK, January 25, 1902.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SIR: The fact that the Nicaragua route will admit of competition by sailing vessels, which that by Panama will not, is much more important in this connection than is generally recognized. As far down as latitude 12° north a sailing ship carries a steady fair wind; below that line she falls into what sailors call the doldrums, in which she may roll about for weeks without making progress in any direction. I have known of seventy days spent in coming up from Panama, and I believe cases are known of the voyage taking as much as ninety days. Sailing vessels are comparatively cheap, and the west coast from Cape Mendocino up to Alaska abounds in material.

They are now building four, five, and six masted schooners, with large carrying capacity, and needing but a small ship's company to operate them. So long as these can compete for the trade, the opposition lines can never be bought up or subsided. But steamers are expensive, and costly also to operate, while their carrying capacity is reduced by the amount of space necessarily devoted to the machinery and fuel. Hence they fall into the hands of large companies, which never fail to enter into combination with the opposition lines operating railroads. This has been illustrated here by the combination between the overland roads and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which has endured for over twenty years and will last as long as the climatic conditions at Panama shut out the competition of sailing ships. The Panama Railroad, if its Pacific terminus were approachable by sailing vessels, could compete for a very large share of the transcontinental trade, but the attempt to avail of it for such purpose was abandoned nearly fifty years ago, and for the reason above given.

Consider the immensity of the raw products of the forests and mines of the west coast which would reach an Eastern market through the Nicaragua Canal, but would be shut out from one constructed at Panama. Neither timber, lumber, ores, or coal can afford to pay transportation by steamer. Ships built on Puget Sound and loaded there with lumber and ballasted with ores would carry their cargoes to Eastern ports and bring back coal and coarse goods at rates of freight which steamers could never compete with. The competition of sailing vessels in any branch of the traffic will keep down freights in all.

I have just seen in the Scientific American an article on this subject, one portion of which purports to be written "from an engineering point of view." It is evidently the work of a scribe retained for the purpose of aiding the cause of Panama. I have only read it hurriedly, but one of its assertions is so conspicuously misleading that I stop to refer to it. It speaks of the Panama Railroad as terminating "on each ocean in a good harbor, with ample wharf and dock facilities." It would be worth while to get a chart of each side of the Isthmus at that point to verify this flourishing statement. It is so long since I was at Aspinwall that I can not speak with certainty of the wharf or dock accommodations there, but the general features at Panama can not be effaced. The "bay of Panama" is only 90 miles across; there is no harbor there at all. The shore is a shelving solid rock, that, having a rise and fall of the tide of from 23 to 26 feet requires ships to lie 2 miles offshore; but I am treading on ground with which you are doubtless familiar, and must forbear.

Yours, very truly, JOHN T. DOYLE.

Mr. Doyle was for several years the agent of the Vanderbilt Transportation Company in Nicaragua.

Letter of Senator Edmunds.

DEAR SENATOR MORGAN: I thank you for sending me the proceedings before your committee concerning the statement of Mr. Lampre. His notions of French law are certainly amazing, if they are correct, which I greatly doubt. I do hope Congress will not be betrayed into taking up the Panama offer, and thus, as I believe, wrecking for many years to come any isthmian canal. I am amazed at the report of the Commission, apparently implying that they recommend taking up the Panama route, which geographically, as you know, is not nearly so good for our best American uses and interests, and which, I am confident, if adopted, would, within the lifetime of many of the Commission, demonstrate to them that clay dams will not permanently hold the Chagres River in submission. The advantage of the great Nicaraguan Lake for the cleansing of vessels in fresh water is enough alone, it seems to me, to have compelled the adoption of that route.

The title of the Panama Company is, to say the least, darkly clouded with civil and international difficulties. I have not the means of examining our treaty with Colombia on the subject of isthmian transit through that country, but I suspect that we have become under obligations to all the world to protect and defend that canal against all comers, and that Colombia alone can not relieve us from such a claim if it exists. My belief is that the whole newspaper opposition to the Nicaraguan route, and its support of the Panama one, or its effort to leave it with the President to decide upon the route, is entirely inspired by great and selfish interests that do not intend that there shall be any canal at all as long as they can prevent it.

Faithfully, yours,

GEO. F. EDMUNDS.

"Nicaragua.—This land possesses additional interests for the political reasons adduced by Emperor Napoleon III in a memoir prepared by him when a prisoner at Ham. Arranged with method and prepared with care, this pamphlet bears the impress of a sagacious judgment. 'In order,' says the writer, 'that the canal should become the principal element of the advancement of Central America, it must be cut, not through the narrowest part of the tongue of land, but through the country which is most populous, the most healthy, and the most fertile, and which is crossed by the greatest number of rivers, in order that its activity may be communicated to the remotest part of the interior.'

"The line selected by Louis Napoleon (although he errs in his statement of distance) has not been improved by the changes in location proposed by subsequent engineers. All these routes commence at San Juan de Nicaragua and follow the San Juan River to the Lake Nicaragua."

"The extreme insalubrity of the Isthmus of Panama, its inability to furnish supplies, and its fatal deficiencies in good ports was early known to the Spanish Government.

"The difficult and deadly route by way of Panama, traversed only at intervals by caravans and mules, sufficed for two centuries for the small necessity of communication with the Pacific.

"Tens of thousands of eager and ambitious men directed their course to Panama, heedless of its insalubrity, and risking decimation in their transit.

"Mr. Squier observes, with a thorough knowledge on the subject, that the Bay of Panama, on the Pacific, 'is in no sense of the word a port.'"

"Regarding Panama.—In this voluminous and interesting report every objection exists as to this route on the score of malarious climate, difficulty of cutting a tunnel, want of regular water supply, and danger from floods of the Chagres River," etc.

TACKELS, page 38:

"We would like the profit available of the geographic and geodetic advantages of the lake of Nicaragua and of the San Juan River, by which it is sufficient to make a cut of relatively less importance than that of Panama, which is much larger, with a soil structure more difficult to dig and a geographical position really dangerous, due to the winds, to the miasmas produced by the tides, and to numerous other obstacles which are not to be met while piercing the Isthmus of Nicaragua."

AMMEN, pages 21 to 31:

"In looking at the construction of a canal across the Isthmus, the health question will be found the most important, even in a commercial point of view, and the humanitarian will be pleased to know that there is perhaps no country on the globe where the canal could be made with less loss of life from disease than on the route of the Nicaragua Canal as now located.

"That the healthfulness of Nicaragua is exceptional for a tropical region, as I shall prove presently, is a well established fact.

"Although the jaguar and couguar abound in this continent, from the boundary of Texas to Patagonia, they do not attack men, and although there are venomous serpents in all intertropical America, they are not numerous, and they are an imaginary rather than a real danger, shown from the fact that in the many surveys made by our Government not one man has been fatally bitten if bitten at all. The wild beasts, although numerous, were never seen, even in their haunts in the thick forest traversed by the surveyors. The Chief Signal Officer of our Government adds another tribute to the climate of this region from his observations: 'Exempt from hurricanes and whirlwinds, owing to the constant movement of air across the Isthmus from the trade winds, although light in the rainy season.' When this canal is made, as it doubtless soon will be, the region lying between the lakes and the Pacific will be the great sanitarium of Europe and the United States, as it will then be easy of access and will be found to fulfill required conditions more fully than any other region known.

"Seven years ago I made the acquaintance of an English gentleman who asked me if I had read a book published in London some years before, entitled 'A Naturalist in Nicaragua.' I subsequently read the book with interest and instruction. It treats of the healthfulness of the climate, even at Greytown, and the causes of it. On mentioning this to Medical Director McCoum, of the Navy, he informed me that his personal observations at Greytown, in relation to the type of fever at that port, confirm the statements of the writer referred to.

"In the sitting of the Association for the Advancement of Science in the city of New York in August, 1887, Surgeon Bradford, of the Navy, gave his ideas in relation to the causes of this exceptional healthfulness of Nicaragua as compared with most intertropical countries. He had been the medical officer of the several expeditions sent to Nicaragua and was competent to express an opinion in relation to the subject. He had also been on the Panama survey and therefore was able to appreciate the wide difference between the two localities. In December, 1887, 60 surveyers and assistants landed at Greytown, accompanied by 100 or more Jamaicans, and had a further accession of force of 40 natives.

"The rainy season prevailed a month or more beyond the usual period, and during that time they were exposed in their tents and in the forests, engaged in work of arduous nature, and this exposure continued for a period of six months without a case of serious illness in the entire party. What was remarkable, the Jamaicans were far more liable to ailment than our countrymen. This climatic difference, so well established as not to admit of dispute, if looked at only in a commercial point of view, is of immense advantage in relation to the execution of a canal, in economy of time and money in Nicaragua, and the reverse on the Isthmus of Panama."

COLQUHOUN, page 141:

"The advantages of Nicaragua over Panama are these: It is a fresh-water canal, with an admirable natural reservoir—the lake. It passes through a region offering prospects of great development, free from the marshy soil, the overpowering heat, and the unhealthful climate of Panama. There is no Chagres River problem, and the 'divide' stands in a different category to that of the Culebra at Panama. There is trade wind all the year, bringing with it health. There is the valuable experience gained at Panama. There is accurate knowledge of what has been done, based upon thorough and intelligent investigation.

"The inexhaustible water power available is invaluable, while the material from the divide cuts is useful for the dams, embankments, locks, and breakwaters."

Report of J. ED. STUBBERT, M. D., chief surgeon of the Nicaragua Canal Construction Company—Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, Report 2126, House of Representatives, page 23:

"We now come to the number of patients treated, classification of diseases, mortality, etc. The time covered by the statistical portion of this report will be from November 1, 1889, to December 31, 1890, as, owing to the fact that until October 16 there was no recognized head to the department, no previous records are in existence. During these fourteen months there have been admitted into headquarters hospital 1,669 patients, of which 1,347 were medical and 322 surgical. Of the whole number there have been discharged cured or improved 1,646. The total number of deaths has been 23, or 1.38 per cent of those admitted. These deaths can be subdivided as follows:

"Those due to accidents, 5, or one-third of 1 per cent; those due to chronic diseases contracted before entering the company's employ, 6, or one-third of 1 per cent; those due to diseases contracted while in the company's employ, i. e., climatic diseases, 12, or seven-tenths of 1 per cent.

"This fact I wish to emphasize, viz, that out of over 1,600 patients only 12 have died from diseases that may be termed climatic.

"It has been generally supposed that this country teems with fatal maladies and that the employes are exposed to severe and dangerous types of fevers. After a professional experience of ten years, most of which time has been spent in the Tropics, and been familiar with nearly every climate of the globe, I can state that Nicaragua is exceptionally exempt from any fatal epidemic diseases.

"To show how varied in character are the diseases met with and how closely they resemble in class those of a temperate rather than a tropical climate, I will enumerate some of the most prevalent in this hospital:

Remittent fever	208
Bronchitis	65
Indolent ulcers	38
Intermittent fever	433
Cholerine	19
Phthisis pulmonalis	3
Pernicious fever	6
Pneumonia	17
Dysentery	47

"The disease which is most liable to prove fatal is dysentery, but this characteristic of that grave disorder is the same in all climates. Most of the diseases met with have been mild in type, this being especially true of bronchitis and pneumonia, the latter frequently having its crisis on the sixth day. The cases of fever, when of the remittent or intermittent types, are very amenable to treatment and not of a long duration, the former generally disappearing in about four and one-half instead of twelve to fourteen days, as is its usual duration in the United States.

"No epidemic disease has visited the country since the company has been at work, and the occasional rumors that one hears of such visitations in the past upon investigation lack sufficient evidence to give them credence. Two illustrations will suffice. During the summer of 1889 a great panic was caused by reported cases of yellow fever in San Juan del Norte. The sequel proved them to be nothing more than a few isolated cases of pernicious malarial fever, in which jaundice was a prominent symptom. In the summer of 1890 a number of cases of Chagres fever and adynamic types of malarial fever were brought to this port from Colon on towing steamers in service of the company; some of these were reported by the populace as cases of yellow fever. Every one of these admitted to our hospital recovered, while of those admitted to the Colon Hospital a number died. Thus it is seen that not only are we not specially subject to fatal diseases, but when aggravated cases of epidemic disorders are brought here from other localities the tendency is toward recovery.

"Climate.—The climate of Nicaragua is, as has been asserted, and we think proven by the record of this department, a salubrious one. Far removed from the severity of Northern winters, even while geographically in the Tropics, we enjoy an equable temperature throughout the whole year. The northeast trade wind tempers the atmosphere and has a marked influence. The temperature has an extreme range of 18.5 degrees, from a maximum of 71 to 89.5 degrees, or a mean of 77.25 degrees. The dredges have been at work in the harbor and in the opening of the canal line for some months without causing an increase in the percentage of illness.

"Immunity from sickness of officers.—Our experience in this respect has been eminently satisfactory. Two officers only have died, one a case of suicide, and the other killed by a falling derrick. The fact that not a single case of fatal illness has occurred among our officers, most of whom are brought here from colder climates and exposed constantly to the elements, working in swamps and dense forests, speaks for itself."

Hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 1896. Senate Report No. 1109, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.

Examination of Hon. WARNER MILLER, page 59:

"Mr. PATTERSON. I understand after you get out of the basin at Greytown and get to the foothills from here to the Pacific Ocean you have a salubrious climate—it is rather healthful country—and there would be less likelihood of any people engaged in labor dying and being sick than at Greytown?

"Mr. MILLER. The conditions are these, and the records show it: At Greytown there is never a day in the year in which the trade winds do not blow—in which the winds blow from the ocean to the land. The result is, while this low land would naturally create miasma and fever, and does to a certain extent, these constantly blowing winds make it substantially healthy. As I told you, there were for six months 1,600 Jamaica negroes working upon this line of railroads 11 miles long. Only four of them died there of any disease; others were killed by accidents.

"The moment you approach the foothills and mountains the rain decreases. When you come to the lake, we have a record from Dr. Hall, who lives at Rivas, 5 miles from the line of the canal, who has resided there for thirty or forty years. I know him well. He has kept a record of the rainfall of all that region, which shows an average fall of 65 inches annually. Of course, no tropical country is a sanitarium, but I went through that country in the month of March and part of April with a party of 30 gentlemen. Some of them were 60 years of age and others down to 20 years of age, none of whom were familiar with the Tropics or had been in them. We tramped down through this wilderness and slept in open sheds at night and waded swamps and drank the water of the country. Not one of the thirty was sick at all during the entire journey or during the time we were there.

"We have had American engineers who have been continuously three years in Nicaragua without even being sick or going to the hospital. Other engineers have been sick for a short time, but the record of the hospital—and I believe the subcommittee have had Dr. Stubbert before them, who was chief surgeon in charge of this business all the time the company was carrying on work, and here is a short sketch from the hospital, if it will not detain the committee too long. Here is one year's work: Number of patients in the hospital, December 31, 1890, 25; admitted during the year, 507; total number of patients, 532; discharged cured, 339; discharged improved, 112; unimproved, 8; died, 10. In the hospital December 31, 1891, 63, and of the deaths, 4 were the results of accidents suffered while at work and 5 were from climatic ailments.

"Mr. PATTERSON. What about the Chagres fever which prevails in Panama?

"Mr. MILLER. No such fever has been known at Nicaragua, and there is no record in modern times of a single case of yellow fever even at Greytown. During our work there came a steamer there from Colon bringing up a portion of this dredging plant which we bought. When it left Colon it had Chagres fever. Some 4 or 5 of its crew were put in the hospital at Colon and the vessel came on to Greytown. When it arrived there it had 6 or 8 men down with Chagres fever, and they were taken out and put into our hospital and treated, and none of our men took the disease; and every one of those men who went into the hospital was cured and came out, and every one who went into the hospital at Colon died. That is the only record we have in that matter."

Hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 1896, Senate Report No. 1109, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.

Examination of Col. WILLIAM LUDLOW:

"Colonel LUDLOW. On the other hand, the sanitary history of the Panama enterprise is very dreadful. The mortality down there both in the construction of the railroad and the construction of the canal, as far as it has gone, and it is apparently about half built, was very great indeed, very great; the mortality was tremendous.

"Mr. DOOLITTLE. Do you remember what percentage it was during any given time?

"Colonel LUDLOW. No; it is not easily ascertained. The hospital records show the mortality. Of course, it is not likely we would really get the whole of it, because people do not like to publish those particulars."

MCCORCKLE, page 130:

"The Isthmus of Panama is one of the most unhealthy sections of the world, and it lies at the end of a land-locked bay, through which the trade winds never blow, and the location of the canal at that point would require the towing of a sailing vessel for at least 100 miles to the mouth of the canal.

Hearings, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, Senate Report No. 1265. June 20, 1898, ordered to be printed, page 88.

Senator MORGAN. What effect does that have upon the health of the country?

Admiral WALKER. The country is perfectly healthy. We have had an average of 250 people at work. Our parties that have been on the west side have been in a very healthy country; there has been no sickness whatever. On the east side our parties have been working in swamps and water, and there has been less malarial fever than there would be in running a survey in Virginia at this time of the year.

From same document, page 117:

Senator MORGAN. What are the conditions as to the health and comfort in that country?

Professor HAUPT. That portion of the Isthmus seems to be particularly exempt from malarial fevers, and especially from yellow fever; they say they have none indigenous—that is, they imported whatever has come there. They have malarial fevers, but they are not particularly fatal. So far as our experience goes, none of our parties have suffered seriously from them. They have had light attacks of malarial fevers, chills and fever, but it has not incapacitated them from doing their work. The natives seem to be exempt from it entirely. I have collected considerable information in regard to the labor question.

"I can cite an experience of nearly four months on board of one of our war vessels stationed at Aspinwall (Colon) during the rainy season. Out of the complement of 180 officers and men only few individuals escaped an attack of the Chagres fever, and the sick list, always large, increased to such an extent that the commanding officer was compelled to take the responsibility of leaving his station without orders, and on the day of our departure there were 80 of the ship's company down with the fever."

"The climate of Nicaragua is very healthy, the soil very fertile, and its great lake is connected with the Atlantic. All these natural advantages did not pass unnoticed, for cities were built there long ago."

WALKER, page 36:

"Climate is of some consequence, even to a passing traveler. The climate of Nicaragua, Mosquito, and Costa Rica is superior to that of the other Central American States."

SQUIER, page 435:

"During seven months on this part of the state illness in the party at no time interrupted a daily prosecution of the survey. Upon the San Juan River the surveying party consisted of 12 persons exclusive of native citizens. The survey occupied six and one-half months, from March to September. The party generally enjoyed good health."

PRODUCTIONS.

BAILY, page 120:

"Nicaragua, as regards soil and fertility, may fairly challenge competition with the most favored part of Central America for most of the purposes of agriculture, which, with suitable applications, could be carried on extensively and prosperously very far beyond what is actually the case, for only a small portion of the land can be said to be improved or made use of. One of the most principal sources of wealth at present consists of cattle; of these there are great numbers in all parts, but most especially in the district known by the name of Chontales, lying on the eastern side of the lakes, and reaching as far as San Miguelito, within a few leagues of the river San Juan."

CHALONER & FLEMMING, pages 21 and 22:

"Regarding Nicaragua.—As there are naturally no obstacles to the execution of this project but what engineering skill, backed by the required funds, can vanquish, the advantages that will thereby accrue to the commerce of the world are so apparent that it would be a mere waste of time to enumerate them."

ABERT, page 54:

"No isthmian project has received so careful examination as the lines passing through Lake Nicaragua. This part of the Isthmus widens into continental proportions of great fertility. The productive and industrial development of this country by means of railroad or canal would supply a material addition to the commerce of the world. With the growth of Central America our gulf ports—Galveston, New Orleans, Mobile, Apalachicola, Pensacola, Tampa Bay, and Key West—would increase in military and commercial importance."

KEASBEY, page 597:

"Then, either as a nation or as a Government, we must construct the Nicaragua Canal exclusively with American capital; for what we own, according to well-recognized laws of property, we can assuredly control and defend, despite international provisions to the contrary. If objections are then raised by our adversaries, we will have fact instead of mere theory wherewith to combat them, and a clear-cut issue will at last be drawn."

COLQUHOUN, page 141:

"Regarding Panama.—When in Central America, in addition to my examination of the Nicaragua Canal, I made a personal inspection of the Panama line, paying especial attention to the two main difficulties, the Chagres River and the Culebra cut. A number of estimates of work done and to be done to carry through the canal, with locks, have been published. The general conclusion I arrived at was that if a lock canal were feasible for practical purposes, not more than one-third of the total work required to complete it has been executed, and that the remaining two-thirds would involve a genuine expenditure of largely over £40,000,000 ($200,000,000)."

CRAIG, pages 48-50:

"With the Nicaragua Canal we connect the Atlantic with the Pacific and increase our commerce in the varied productions of the Pacific States, Central America, Mexico, the western states of South America, the Sandwich Islands, China, Japan, and much of Australia and the East Indies. This canal project has been agitated for years, and no private capital seems inclined to make the venture. As it is of great commercial importance to us, I am proud to be in favor of putting it into actual operation. Bear in mind that we produce nearly one-third of the manufactured goods of the world. We are the richest country on the globe. We have more millionaires, more money on deposit, more capital invested, more railroads, more value in agriculture, more pushing ability than any other country, and now that we need it we say build the Nicaragua Canal just as quickly as you can.

"One method of showing the relative advantages which the Nicaragua and Panama routes would possess is to compare the distances by way of each of them between typical Atlantic and Pacific ports. A few distances are shown in the following table, compiled with the assistance of the United States Hydrographic Office. The table applies only to the routes followed by steamers, and the length of each canal is reckoned in nautical miles.

Between New York and San Francisco the Nicaragua Canal route would be 377 nautical miles shorter than Panama route. Between New Orleans and San Francisco 579 miles would be saved, and, in general, the distances between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States are less by way of Nicaragua.

What the United States particularly desire is to shorten as much as practicable the distance between their eastern and western coasts, in order to be able to defend them eventually with ease at the lowest expenditure for naval transportation, as well as to promote commerce with their Eastern possessions.

Through the waterway of Nicaragua this threefold aim is attainable in the most favorable conditions as compared with any other route for the proposed Nicaragua Canal, besides other known and weighty reasons, shortens the distance in at least two days, which fact in itself means a very considerable saving of money in salaries and general expenses on board ships.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] to interpose no objection to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]; and so the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Isthmian Canals.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I ask that Order of Business No. 277 may be temporarily laid before the Senate, and that the title of the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I think it should be stated at the outset that irrigation is not a sectional question. On the contrary, I find that there is a very strong sentiment throughout the East and South in favor of this legislation. In confirmation of that statement I cite the fact that nearly all of the leading newspapers of the Eastern States have indorsed the President's message with respect to irrigation, and speak highly of it. Amongst those papers I will mention the National Magazine, a noted publication in Boston. Then there are the American Agriculturist and Harper's Weekly. Among the great daily newspapers of the country which have indorsed the President's message in favor of national legislation with respect to irrigation are the Boston Transcript, the Boston Globe, the Boston Watchman, the Worcester (Mass.) Gazette, the New York Tribune, the New York Sun, the New York Times, the New York World, the Brooklyn Eagle, the Binghamton (N. Y.) Republican, the Utica Herald and Dispatch, the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Philadelphia Ledger, the Philadelphia Press, the Providence Bulletin, the Providence News, the Newark (N. J.) News, the Camden Post-Telegram, the Manchester (N. H.) Farmer, and the Detroit Tribune, and many leading newspapers the names of which I have failed to obtain.

Mr. President, these are the names of newspapers published throughout the New England and Eastern States. I believe a list equally as lengthy as this might be added of the newspapers published in the Southern States, not only strongly indorsing the President's message on this question, but insisting that there shall be national legislation on the subject.

Mr. President, the purpose of this measure is to assist in providing homes for the rapidly increasing population of the country. President Roosevelt stated the case in a few words when he said in his message that "successful home making is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation."

To say that the National Government can not, within the Constitution, do its part in the development of the latent wealth that exists in a region that is nearly one-third of the total area of the United States is to discredit the genius of the American people. To say that we may not utilize the waste waters that pour down from the mountain heights, and by applying these waters to public lands that would otherwise be worthless make two blades of grass grow where none grew before, is to admit that national progress has reached the end and that we are henceforth doomed to slow decay.

If I may be pardoned for referring to the constitutional features of the case, I find that it has been deemed expedient under the Constitution to construct large reservoirs at the head waters and along the tributaries of our great rivers for the benefit of navigation, and incidentally, not accidentally, these reservoirs have been and are now being used as storage places for millions of saw logs. In some instances navigation has come to be the incidental and log storage the chief purpose. Appropriations for this work have been made, amounting to many millions of dollars directly from the Federal Treasury. By the terms of this bill it is proposed to devote the receipts from the sales of public lands to the improvement of the lands, converting the desert into productive fields and pastures and making homes for homeless people. It is proposed to conserve the torrential waters of the streams and put them upon the plains for the primary benefit of the husbandman, the incidental protection of navigation, and the ultimate and permanent benefit of the nation. Touching this phase of the question the President very aptly says that—

The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the head waters of our rivers is but an enlargement of our present policy of river control, under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams.

Mr. President, it will be a difficult task to find a constitutional distinction between these two classes of work. Had the reclamation of the public domain been a burning question when the Constitution was framed, perhaps the gentlemen who are now interested in the deepening and widening of channels, and the storage of saw logs, for the benefit of navigation would be without as well as within these doors clamoring for recognition under the general-welfare clause of our organic law. No one has thought of complaining of the policy of opening rivers to navigation at Government expense, so that settlers might go in and lay out new fields of enterprise and industry, and there has been no objection to keeping these rivers open at Government expense, so that the people could market their products. It would be a bold mathematician who would undertake to compute the amount of public money spent in this way. It is conceded that great national benefit has resulted; so we do not stop to ask the cost.

The advocates of a national irrigation policy submit a plan whereby large areas of land, now practically worthless, may be opened, not at Government expense, but at a cost to be assessed against the land. We ask no appropriation to dredge rivers or construct railroads or other highways to facilitate the marketing of the products of these lands. Private capital will do that. Branch railway lines will, in most instances, precede the settler. Towns will spring up in advance of the ripening of the first crop, and out of these activities will come a new demand for manufactured products. This will make New England a party in interest. Pennsylvania and Ohio will secure a share of the new orders for steel. The South will find an additional market for her cotton and tobacco.

The urgency of the case, Mr. President, lies in the fact that the public domain in the humid and subhumid sections of the West is well-nigh exhausted. The frontiers of western settlement are on the very verge of the arid and semiarid region. Indeed, a large proportion of the home seekers of the past two years, in their eagerness for lands, have pushed on beyond the humid into the semiarid areas in the hope that either a wise Providence or a dutiful Congress, or both, would eventually rescue them from the dangers of drought.

It should be understood at the outset that the plan proposed by this bill does not require a great outlay of money; that it does not contemplate a "raid upon the Treasury," as is apprehended by some gentlemen who have given the question only a superficial examination. Neither is there the slightest probability of an overproduction of small grains as a result of the successful operation of the project.

First. The cost is limited to the proceeds from the sale and disposal of public lands in the thirteen States and three Territories named in the bill. This would involve a sum aggregating, perhaps, $2,500,000 per annum, according to official reports on the present income from this source. It is provided in the bill that the cost of construction of each irrigation project shall be paid by the persons directly benefited. Thus the money expended would constantly be recouped or repaid to the reclamation fund, making the system automatic and self-sustaining.

Second. As to the fear of overproduction of farm products, there is no ground whatever for alarm. While it is true that there are in the great West about 600,000,000 acres of lands which might be irrigated, the essential fact is that there is not sufficient water available, and never will be, to reclaim more than 10 per cent of the whole area, or about 60,000,000 acres. It should not be taken for granted, however, that the whole of this area would be irrigated from Government works. The irrigation experts of the Geological Survey, basing their calculations upon the most thorough investigations in the field, give it as their opinion that 20,000,000 acres would be the limit of land irrigated from waters conserved by Government enterprises, but that this would serve as a nucleus about which private effort would reclaim an equal amount, or 40,000,000 acres in all. On this point I will quote from the very interesting and instructive letter from the Director of the Geological Survey to be found in the report accompanying this bill:

> The surveys and examinations made in different parts of the arid region show that the cost of water conservation ranges from $5 per acre in the most favorable cases up to $20 or $25 per acre where the conditions are less favorable. Moreover, whereas $25 per acre may be prohibitory in Montana for raising alfalfa, it is reasonable in Arizona, where high-class products are produced. An arbitrary statement, therefore, of the cost per acre reclaimed bears little relation to the feasibility of the enterprise.
> The cost of reclamation also depends upon the completeness with which the work is done. For example, the irrigation of 10,000 acres may cost only $10 per acre, but the irrigation of 15,000 additional acres may cost $15 per acre. Viewed as an investment only, it might be found more profitable in such a case to irrigate the smaller acreage; but as a matter of larger benefits to the people by the creation of more homes, it might be wiser to advocate the more complete system, under the general principle that in developing the resources of the country the larger benefits consistent with economy should be sought, and not merely the cheapest or the immediately profitable.
> The reclamation of 20,000,000 acres of arid land by means of irrigation would, on an average, cost probably from $10 to $15 per acre, and the ultimate average value would be three times as much.
>
> It has been variously estimated that there is available water for from 60,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres. It is not necessary for the Government to conserve all of this water. If the Government should build the great dams and divert the large rivers, individual enterprise would be able to put the water upon the greater part of the land. It is estimated that if the Government should conserve water for 20,000,000 acres individuals would be able to obtain water for the remaining reclaimable land.
>
> The limit of 20,000,000 acres has been set for Government work as being a liberal allowance, when consideration is had of the projects which are of sufficient size or importance to justify construction by the Government. It is assumed that it will not be the intention of Congress to irrigate the land, but merely to build some of the larger works. The possibilities of construction of these are limited by the character of the country. Taking the vast extent of the arid region as a whole, and the number of projects called to public attention, there are comparatively few of these which would justify more than survey and careful examination. The facts developed by impartial work conclusively prove that for some of these projects there is no reasonable demand for Government work.
>
> If the Government provides the larger storage works and regulates the rivers, it will then be possible for private enterprise to again take up the work of bringing water to the land.
>
> From the experience already acquired in the development of the arid regions, it may be assumed that where water is conserved for the direct reclamation of 1 acre there are ultimately brought in use 2 or 3 acres through the possibility of taking advantage of floods, through the use of seepage, through pumping plants, and by various other devices. In short, if the Government, by means of large storage works, or by taking water from great rivers, should provide water directly for 20,000,000 acres which otherwise would not be irrigated, this act would render possible the gradual utilization of the greater part of the remainder through construction of smaller individual systems.
> In the present state of engineering science, and at existing values of land, it will not be possible to now utilize all the waste waters within practical limits of expense. The influence of new inventions, cheaper appliances, and the increased demand for land make it impossible to place any definite limits upon the development.

At an estimated average cost of $15 per acre for construction of works, the reclamation and settlement of this 20,000,000 acres would bring to the fund the total sum of $300,000,000, not from the Treasury of the United States, but from the lands themselves. Now, it is unreasonable to suppose that the whole of this 20,000,000 acres would be reclaimed in one or ten or even in twenty years. The Director of the Survey estimates that with the income provided for in the pending measure a period of thirty-eight years would be required in which to reclaim 20,000,000 acres; so that reclamation would proceed at an average rate of about 526,000 acres a year for thirty-eight years. Assuming that 20,000,000 acres would be reclaimed by private enterprise, what shall be done toward subduing the remaining 560,000,000 acres must be left to future generations. The problem is not likely to be solved in advance of the necessities which will arise out of the mutations of time and the vicissitudes of struggling humanity.

No one will therefore seriously contend that, under the proposed irrigation policy laid down in the President's message and provided for in this bill, the settlement of the public domain would proceed by leaps and bounds, to the detriment of the farmers of the East or of any other section.

Assuming that $2,000,000 per annum are available for construction and that it will take two years on an average to construct works and sell the land, we can make some estimates as to results:

Year.	Receipts from sale of public lands.	Receipts from sale of reclaimed lands at $15 per acre.	Total receipts.	Lands reclaimed.
1902	$2,000,000		$2,000,000
1903	2,000,000		2,000,000	$133,333
1904	2,000,000	$200,000	2,200,000	133,333
1905	2,000,000	400,000	2,400,000	146,667
1906	2,000,000	620,000	2,620,000	160,000
1907	2,000,000	860,000	2,860,000	174,666
1908	2,000,000	1,122,000	3,122,000	190,666
1909	2,000,000	1,408,000	3,408,000	208,133
1910	2,000,000	1,720,200	3,720,200	227,200
1911	2,000,000	2,061,000	4,061,000	248,013
1912	2,000,000	2,433,020	4,433,020	270,733
1913	2,000,000	2,839,120	4,839,120	295,613
1914	2,000,000	3,082,422	5,082,422	322,608
1915	2,000,000	3,366,334	5,366,334	338,828
Total				2,849,793

According to this table it appears that less than 3,000,000 acres of land would be reclaimed in fourteen years under this bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator state in this connection what his judgment is as to the amount of land which can be reclaimed?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The statement to which I have referred from the Director of the United States Geological Survey is to the effect that within a period of thirty-eight years the Government of the United States, under the provisions of this bill, will be enabled to reclaim 20,000,000 acres of land, and that the work necessary to reclaim this amount of land would serve as a nucleus whereby private enterprise would reclaim a like amount, or 40,000,000 acres in all in thirty-eight years, about 526,000 acres a year being Government reclamation.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from North Dakota pardon me for a moment?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think that is quite an important point. The estimates of engineers vary greatly in regard to the amount of land which is susceptible of cultivation and which can be reclaimed with water which is available or can be made available. Those estimates run from 8,000,000 to 30,000,000 acres, all told, out of the 600,000,000 acres of arid lands.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have been more liberal than the engineers. I have placed it at 10 per cent of 600,000,000, or 60,000,000 acres of land which may be reclaimed by the available water. I think that is a very important point, because it will dispel the idea in the minds of some people that by a national system of irrigation we are going to overproduce the cereal crops of the country and thereby reduce prices.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator speaking to a bill which has been reported?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPOONER. If I may inquire of the Senator, does the bill provide for the appropriation to the various arid-land States and Territories of the proceeds of the sales of arid lands?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The proceeds from the sales of lands in those States and Territories.

Mr. SPOONER. Who is to expend the money?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPOONER. It has to be done by the National Government?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. By contract?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. By contract.

Mr. SPOONER. Are those contracts limited in amount to the proceeds in the Treasury for that purpose?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They are, absolutely. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that no contract shall be made for an amount exceeding the amount of money in the reclamation fund.

Mr. SPOONER. For a particular State or Territory?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. For that particular area, including all the States and Territories—the thirteen States and three Territories named in the bill.

In connection with these estimates it is interesting to scan the annual returns made to the Secretary of the Interior of lands of all classes disposed of during the past ten years. While under the proposed irrigation system the average rate of settlement would not exceed 526,000 acres per annum, lands have been taken at the rate of from 8,000,000 to 15,000,000 acres a year without national irrigation.

During the same decade, with more than 112,000,000 acres added to the cultivated area of the country, the prices of principal farm products have at least remained normal. In fact, they are higher than they were in 1892. The following table is worthy of careful study in this connection:

JOHN HYDE, Statistician.

DECEMBER 27, 1901.

The Agricultural Department has not computed the average prices for 1901, but as a supplement to the table furnished by the Department a statement of Chicago prices for the month of December in each year, from 1899 to 1901, inclusive, will suffice to bear out the argument that prices have not fallen:

Chicago prices—Mean of highest and lowest during month of December.

Years.	Wheat, per bushel.	Corn, per bushel.	Oats, per bushel.	Barley, per bushel.	Rye, per bushel.	Hay, per ton.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1899	66⅛	30⅛	22⅛	40	50⅛	$11.00
1900	71⅛	37⅛	22⅛	49	47½	12.75
1901	76⅛	64 7/16	45⅛	60⅛	62⅛	13.20

From these statistics it appears that with the settlement of more than 25,000,000 acres of humid and subhumid lands in 1892–93 the average prices of corn and oats during the following year of 1894 were higher than for any year during the decade, and that the prices for barley and rye were above the average for the same period. Again, with the disposal and settlement of more than 13,000,000 acres of the public domain in 1900, the average December prices for all farm products in 1901 were much above the average prices for any year as far back as 1892. So that the rapid settlement of the public domain can not truthfully be said to have affected detrimentally the prices of farm products. Nor can it be maintained that the opening of a little more than half a million acres annually by means of irrigation would result in overproduction. On the contrary, it is the history of all irrigated sections that the output of bread foods from irrigated lands rarely meets the local requirements.

Wherever irrigation has been successfully applied large communities have grown up. New mines have been opened in the adjacent mountains, manufactories have been established in the valleys, and railroads have been extended. Naturally these enterprises bring in large numbers of people. All students of irrigation (and this class includes the men who till the irrigated soil) will attest the declaration of the fact that grasses, fruit, and vegetables are the chief products that come from irrigated lands. In recent years there has been a great scarcity of forage for stock. The large ranges are being gradually denuded of their grasses, and in many instances stockmen have been obliged to decrease their herds. The natural consequence is a falling off in the number of beef cattle in the West as compared with the increase in population, and an inevitable increase in the price of meats in all the markets of the country. The inauguration of a broader and more general system of irrigation would be a great boon to the stockmen as well as to the consumers of beef. With hay selling at from $8 to $13 per ton the irrigator would devote himself to the production of grasses, thus solving the problem which so closely concerns the owners of herds.

Mr. President, a well-known irrigation expert declares that the necessity of immediately adopting some definite policy with respect to irrigation arises from the fact that, under existing land laws, sources of water supply are being seized upon with great rapidity, largely by men who are not able to utilize them and who are holding them for speculative purposes. For example, a man may secure control of a spring or locality where water might be held to irrigate 10,000 acres. He holds this for his cattle or for raising forage. He has not the means to conserve the water, nor could he do this profitably. It is of no particular interest to him whether 50 or 100 families or more might make homes upon the vacant land adjoining. If he could build the works, and if he could get the people there, and if, having them there, he could exercise governmental control over them, he could make a fortune, but he can not do it, and so these public lands around him lie idle.

There are thousands of such instances. In one way or another control of the situation is rapidly passing away from the people, and vested rights are growing up. This absence of wise control, if continued, must result in the arid West remaining thinly populated, instead of furnishing opportunities for millions of people. Nothing less than prompt action on the part of Congress can prevent this calamity.

The construction of works of reclamation by the Government does not necessarily involve the actual irrigation of the land by the Government. By saving the floods or by constructing large diversion works, taking water from a river and turning it over a divide, it becomes possible for the settlers to build their own distributing systems in the same way that the pioneers have done.

The people who originally came to the arid West found a scanty but widely distributed water supply, which they proceeded to utilize. This they have done up to the limit of the available sources. There are other vast quantities of water, however, which are beyond the reach of settlers, and can not be used until regulated or conserved. It is impossible for a home seeker to go out upon the desert and, unaided or by cooperation, build great reservoirs such a sare constructed in other countries by the government. The utilization of the vacant public lands for creating homes can be brought about only by the building of large works which are beyond the means of settlers and which can not be made sources of private enterprise under existing laws and institutions.

The people of the country, as personified by the Government, are the great landowners. They, as a whole, are benefited by the disposal of the vacant lands, the settlement of the waste places, and the consequent increase of manufacturing and transportation. They can afford to disregard questions of immediate profit in favor of the ultimate settlement of the arid regions.

A system of reclamation is practicable only in the sense that certain broad principles are to be clearly established as to what classes of works may be built by the Government. Each individual project should be weighed on its merits, and with reference to these principles. Each large item should be considered and the construction of the work authorized only after careful examination and report by impartial experts. Such report should show the location, capacity, cost, and benefits to be derived. Each project will be found to have certain disadvantages, as well as advantages, and it must be recognized at the outset that controversies will arise even though these matters are removed as far as possible from local interests. It is possible that disadvantages, though trivial in relation to the whole, will sometimes be magnified, obscuring the great benefits to be derived from the work. The pending bill aims to meet all these conditions.

Mr. President, it is the settled policy of this Government to appropriate the public lands for the benefit of new settlers and the development of agriculture. Among the early acts of Congress under this head was the one providing for military bounties consisting of appropriations of public lands for the benefit of those who fought the battles of the country. Later, under the act of 1862, Congress voted 30,000 acres of the public domain to each State to encourage the establishment of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The land-scrip act of 1862 was amended in 1890 so as to give to each State and Territory a certain amount of cash from the public land proceeds for the benefit of agricultural colleges. The amount paid out to date under the act of 1890 is about $12,000,000. Each State and Territory now receives $25,000 a year, and in some of the States, notably in the South, the money is being used to develop improved methods of cotton spinning, as is shown in the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1901.

I will ask to have the extract read at the desk, because it has an important bearing on the appropriation of public lands to public purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIETRICH in the chair). If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

These institutions, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, granting lands to the several States for the establishment of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and further endowed by an act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, are constantly extending their sphere of usefulness. The past few years have witnessed the establishment of short courses of study in agriculture, dairying, mechanic arts, household economy, etc., for the benefit of such persons as can not spare the time to take a regular course. These courses are well patronized, thus showing that they supply a real need. Another line of work in which these institutions are engaged and through which their influence is widely spread is farmers' institute work. A description of the work done in this line during the year is given in this connection.

Three of the land-grant colleges in Southern States (Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina) have recently established courses of study in textile industry, with special reference to the manufacture of cotton goods. These institutions have provided buildings of regular cotton-mill design, equipped with machinery and apparatus for textile work. The establishment of these courses should result in a few years in the graduation of persons well equipped to take charge of the cotton mills being erected throughout the Southern States, which enable these States to sell more and more of the finished product instead of the raw material alone.

Now, it is most desirable that these experiments should be continued, because they are of great assistance in advancing the calling of the agriculturist and the manufacturer. Hence the pending bill makes provision for a continuation of the payments to agricultural colleges.

The pressing question now before us, Mr. President, is, How shall we continue to provide profitable employment for the people and at the same time preserve in them the spirit of self dependence? The accumulation of vast fortunes has been the source of much speculation among political economists. That this condition is the natural result of the phenomenal opportunities peculiar to a land susceptible of marvelous development is accepted without debate by many thoughtful men.

It is argued by some that as wealth grows larger in a few hands the opportunities of the laboring classes to secure employment are multiplied. Doubtless this contention is based upon sound reasoning, but looking a little beyond immediate benefits, it appears that the tendency under such a condition is to dwarf self-reliance in the masses and to make the mere service of opulent employers by the great army of breadwinners the fulfillment of all human ambition. I think it is the duty of the legislator to pursue a policy under which the greatest possible number of our people may be provided with the means of independent employment, by which the aspirations of the individual may be encouraged and developed. To this end I give my support to this bill, believing that it is a national duty to enhance the value of the public domain by facilitating its settlement under the most favorable conditions. So long as there is a quarter section of Government land I would make it possible for some one to build a home upon it. This was the purpose of the Government from the beginning, and that purpose became the fixed policy when the homestead law was enacted.

From the earliest days of the Republic the hardy immigrant has gone to the West and secured a home practically without cost, and when the settler in the Middle States had subdued the forests and reared a family he has sent his sons to the plains beyond the Mississippi, where they found a wonderful soil, easily cultivated under natural conditions. But these rare opportunities for the home builder have almost reached their limit. Soon the home seeker will be obliged to retrace his steps and take up his abode in the cities, already overflowing with surplus population. If the National Government fails to do its duty in respect of the development of the arid public lands beyond the hundredth meridian, we may soon find ourselves in the situation of one of the leading foreign governments which but recently entered upon the construction of a vast system of canals at a cost of $150,000,000, not that the canals are really required for the advancement of commerce, but because of the discontent among her unemployed people.

Mr. President, for several years past our trade with foreign countries has been phenomenal. This is especially true as respects our exports. First we tempted the foreign appetite with our bread foods, and soon the whole world began to buy. Then we sent across the seas the samples of our mechanical skill. Foreigners came to our World's Fair at Chicago and saw the unparalleled display of American machinery. Orders have been pouring in for our manufactured goods, until now our modern railway equipments, our electrical appliances, our steel bridges, our farm machinery, and a hundred other mechanical appliances the product of American mills and factories are to be found in successful use around the globe.

The demand has been so stupendously great that we are justified in pausing to ask if it is to continue indefinitely. The answer is that ultimately there must be a limit to the ability of foreign countries to buy; that in the very nature of things the demand can not outrun the supply. Indeed, there are evidences that the manufacturer must soon turn again to the good old home market if he would keep his enlarged factories in operation. When he does, he may not find the home market ready to take all his surplus products. Reveling in the saturnalia of trade with foreign countries covering the past half dozen years, he may have overlooked the prime duty of urging an important line of development, namely, the expansion of domestic resources. He will find the arid region of his own country unclaimed. He will find the mountain torrents going to waste, Congress having failed to authorize their utilization in the interest of home building. He will find a multitude of men crowding the great cities who should be adding wealth to the nation and bettering their own condition by tilling the soil.

This, Mr. President, presents but one of several neglected opportunities. The best industry is home industry. The best market is the home market. The most substantial and enduring wealth is that wealth which is permanently attached to the nation as a result of domestic enterprise. The foreign market is in many ways a transitory thing. We control it to-day; to-morrow it may be lost to us. We put our highest hopes in it with the ever-present danger of having them shattered. A policy of self-reliance is the best policy with nations as with men. It is the pursuit of this policy that has brought us greatness as a nation and as a people. It was this thought, I am sure, that inspired Charles Sumner to declare that "the true greatness of nations is in those qualities which constitute the greatness of the individual."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be made the unfinished business after the present unfinished business—the Philippine tariff bill—is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill which he has discussed may be made the unfinished business when the present unfinished business is disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The order is made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

BRIDGE ACROSS COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2782) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 7, to strike out section 9, in the following words:

SEC. 9. That whenever the Secretary of War has good reason to believe that any of the provisions of sections 4, 6, and 8 of this act have not been complied with by the company or persons owning, controlling, or operating the bridge authorized under its provisions, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof thereof, to require the said company or persons to comply with the provisions of said sections, and, on failure of said persons or company to comply with said requirements within a reasonable time, the Secretary of War shall proceed to cause the necessary work, in the form of additions, alterations, repairs, or removal of obstructions, to be made at the expense of the United States and shall refer the matter, without delay, to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be for the recovery of such expense, and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, section 12, line 6, after the word "reserved," to strike out:

And the right to require the entire removal of the bridge constructed under the provisions of this act, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

So as to make the section read:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 460) increasing the limit of cost of public building at Newport News, Va.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the amount heretofore fixed as a limit of cost for the purchase of site and erection of a building for the accommodation of the post-office, custom-house, and other Government offices at the city of Newport News, Va., to $250,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2170) to provide for the erection of a post-office in the city of New York, and making appropriation therefor.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of New York, borough of Manhattan, and State of New York, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $2,500,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon, and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites. The selection and determination of said site shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, the postmaster of New York City, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and the president of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, who are hereby constituted a commission for the purpose and are hereby authorized and directed to make such selection and designation.

When said commission has determined upon a site in accordance with the authority conferred in this bill, the commission shall certify its findings to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, upon approving the same, shall proceed to acquire the property included in said site under the authority conferred by this bill.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a post-office building thereon at New York, borough of Manhattan, and State of New York."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TACOMA, WASH.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 256) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other governmental offices in the city of Tacoma and State of Washington, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $350,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon, and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall within thirty days after such examination make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Tacoma, in the State of Washington."

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICES FOR OKLAHOMA.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 715) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The Secretary preceded to read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to finishing the bill now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the bill which is being read may be considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill and the necessity for its passage. What are the circumstances which render its passage necessary?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, Oklahoma has a population of over 500,000. It embraces 26 organized counties, in each of which two terms of district court must be held annually, thus making 54 terms of district court which must be held by the five judges now provided by law. The same judges must hold, in addition to this, two terms of the supreme court each year.

During the past year three new counties have been organized and settled and now contain a population of more than 100,000. These counties have had no courts, and the present number of judges is inadequate to give them any without seriously neglecting the business of the other courts.

It is necessary for the judges to hold night sessions during a great part of the time; yet this does not enable them to promptly dispose of the public business. The five district courts disposed of 3,597 cases during the past year, and there were filed during the same year 4,725 new causes, and at the present time new cases are filed more rapidly than they can be finally determined.

The supreme court of the Territory consists of a supreme justice and four associate justices.

Each district court has jurisdiction of all causes in law and equity except probate matters. It has the combined jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts of the United States. It has concurrent jurisdiction in all misdemeanors and original exclusive jurisdiction of all felonies. It is also the appellate court for the probate, justice of the peace, and police courts and the board of county commissioners. Each district court is a court of bankruptcy.

Each judge is required to reside in the district to which he is assigned, and in attending the sessions of the supreme court and the terms of the district court he is obliged to be absent from home quite two-thirds of the time and at his own expense.

The governor of the Territory in his last annual report directs attention to the necessity for additional judges.

The work of the courts [said he] has been, as a rule, expeditiously transacted, but the rapid growth and development of the Territory has caused a natural increase in the business of the courts which is becoming such that it seems imperative that additional judges should be accorded the Territory in order to dispose of the business as promptly as should be desired.

It is of the utmost importance not only that justice should be honestly and wisely administered, but that it should be administered without unreasonable delay. As the Senator is well aware, "justice delayed is justice denied."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The extraordinary conditions existing in Oklahoma last year would naturally bring up a large amount of business that would probably not be permanent. The opening of the Indian reservations and the number of people going in there would naturally bring about lawsuits in larger number than are likely to occur on any ordinary occasion. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if the supreme court of the Territory is a court in banc constituted of the trial judges?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is that the case in all the Territories?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have not examined the laws with respect to all the other Territories.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not believe it ought to be the case anywhere.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is so in New Mexico, I think, and it is so in Arizona.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I would be glad if the Judiciary Committee, instead of bringing in a proposition to increase the number of judges in the Territory, had provided for a supreme court, a court of appeals, and district judges. I know that in a number of cases where the supreme court is constituted of trial judges there is great dissatisfaction by litigants, owing to the fact that it is practically a rehearing almost by the same men.

While the judge who sits in the court below does not sit in the court in banc, by his association with the judges and the revision of the judge's decision below it is at best a delicate matter where the trial judges are also members of the supreme court.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator. I think it is a bad practice, but it is sanctioned by almost immemorial usage.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it ought to be broken up, and there ought to be a supreme court constituted now.

Now, one more question. Will the two judges provided for in this bill be circuit judges, as the others are?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. They will have the same jurisdiction exactly as the other judges.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And perform the same duties?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. And perform the same duties.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It divides the Territory into seven circuits instead of five.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir. Into seven instead of five.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 11, section 2, after the word "court," to strike out the words "who shall have been residents of said Territory for at least one year, and;" and in line 5, on page 2, section 2, to strike out "five thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred;" so as to make the section read:

That it shall be the duty of the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two additional associate justices of said supreme court, who shall hold their office for the term of four years, or until their successors are appointed and qualified, and the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of said Territory shall each receive as compensation the sum of $4,500 per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5833) temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe the pending amendment is the first one proposed by the committee. I should like, in order to perfect that amendment before it is put, to move certain verbal changes. In line 24, page 2, after the word "exported," I move to insert the word "directly."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is an important question, and I think there ought to be at least a considerable part of the Senate here. I ask if there is a quorum present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dillingham,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.
Allison,	Dolliver,	Lodge,	Platt, N. Y.
Bacon,	Dubois,	McCumber,	Scott,
Bate,	Elkins,	McEnery,	Simmons,
Berry,	Fairbanks,	McLaurin, S. C.	Simon,
Beveridge,	Frye,	McMillan,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Teller,
Burton,	Hansbrough,	Martin,	Tillman,
Carmack,	Harris,	Millard,	Vest,
Clay,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Wellington,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Patterson,	Wetmore.
Cullom,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,
Depew,	Jones, Nev.	Pettus,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the roll call 50 Senators have responded. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "exported," in line 24, page 2, insert the word "directly."

Mr. LODGE. And after the word "islands," in line 24, insert "to the United States;" so as to read:

And exported directly from said islands to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Then, on line 1, page 3, section 2, in order to make the amendment read properly, I move to strike out the words "in the United States" and to insert the word "therein."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. That perfects the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. TELLER. What is the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. The first amendment which is printed in the bill. It can be read if the Senator desires.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as it has been amended.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, on page 2, section 2, after the word "countries," the committee report to insert:

Provided, That upon all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 75 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid: And provided further, That the rates of duty which are required hereby to be levied, collected, and paid upon products of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States shall be less any duty or taxes levied, collected, and paid thereon upon the exportation thereof from the Philippine Archipelago, as provided by the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but all articles, the growth and product of the Philippine Islands, now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty and exported directly from said islands to the United States for use and consumption therein, shall be hereafter exempt from any export duties imposed in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge just what the effect of this amendment is? I can hardly tell from the reading.

Mr. LODGE. In introducing the bill I explained the amendment at some length, but I shall be very happy to explain it again.

Mr. TELLER. That is a long while ago.

Mr. LODGE. It is a long while ago.

The amendment reduces the duties 25 per cent on articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the rates of the Dingley law.

Mr. TELLER. That is the first clause.

Mr. LODGE. That is the first clause. It then deducts from the Dingley rates the amount of the export tax on any article liable to export tax in the Philippine Islands. It then provides that any articles which now come into the United States free under the Dingley Act, but which are liable to an export tax in the Philippine Islands, shall be relieved from that export tax. That applies to hemp, practically, and one or two other small things in which there is no trade to amount to anything. It relieves hemp, which comes in free of export tax at $7.50 a ton.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that is a prohibition on the insular government, as it is called, putting an export tax on anything that comes in free now.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; anything that comes free into the United States comes in without any export tax.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator if that does not apply to hemp going to Europe?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; only to hemp exported directly to the United States "for use and consumption therein."

Mr. TELLER. I suppose we apply the same rule to Spain that we do to ourselves under this provision?

Mr. LODGE. No; not on exports. The Spanish treaty only provides that tonnage dues and import duties shall be the same. Export taxes are not touched by the Spanish treaty.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any objection to that amendment being adopted, so far as I am concerned. I am opposed to the whole bill, but if this will make it any better, very well. I understand that it is the desire on the part of the Philippine Commission to reduce to the amount of 50 per cent instead of the present reduction.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, no.

Mr. TELLER. I do not state that authoritatively or officially.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The recommendation of the Commission is as to the Dingley rates here. It has no reference to export duties there.

Mr. PATTERSON. This amendment covers both propositions. The report of the Taft Commission declares that the Dingley rates on articles exported from the Philippine Islands into the United States shall be reduced at least 50 per cent, and that then the trade between the two countries, to use the language of the Commission, will advance by leaps and bounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to this language in the bill, beginning in line 23, page 2, section 2:

But all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Islands now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty and exported directly from said islands to the United States for use and consumption therein, shall be hereafter, etc.

Mr. LODGE. That is the way it now reads.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is the language of the bill as it stands?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it has been just so read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The next amendment reported by the committee is in section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 3, line 3, after the word "act," the committee propose to insert "in addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands."

Mr. BACON. I should like to hear the amendment read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the clause as it is proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act, in addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands, the same tonnage taxes shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another committee amendment there.

Mr. LODGE. That is to insert the word "foreign" after the word "all" and before the word "vessels."

The SECRETARY. After the word "all," in line 6, it is proposed to insert "foreign;" so as to read "all foreign vessels."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are three or four committee amendments to section 3.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read section 3 as it would be if the amendments proposed to the section were adopted.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act, in addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands, the same tonnage taxes shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all foreign vessels coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago, or engaged in traffic between the ports of the Philippine Archipelago, which are required by law to be levied, collected, and paid upon vessels coming into the United States from foreign countries: Provided, however, That until otherwise provided by law, the provisions of law restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise directly or indirectly from one port of the United States to another port of the United States shall not be applicable to foreign vessels engaging in trade between the Philippine Archipelago and the United States, or between ports in the Philippine Archipelago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment proposed by the committee to the section will be again stated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like very much to have the Senator from Massachusetts state what is the effect of the section as it is proposed to be amended. I confess I am unable, doubtless by reason of my own imperfections, to entirely understand what the effect will be. I will state what my difficulty is.

The first amendment which is proposed by the committee, which is found in italics in lines 3, 4, and 5, is in these words:

In addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands—

That evidently must have reference to a tax upon ships going into the Philippine Islands. Now, how a tax upon ships going into the Philippine Islands is to be added to tonnage dues of ships coming into the United States is the thing I desire to have the Senator explain. I do not know whether I have made myself clearly understood or not.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I understand what the Senator means. That first amendment to section 3 does not relate, of course, to vessels coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, but to the second clause, "or engaged in traffic between the ports of the Philippine Archipelago."

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator is endeavoring to ingraft it upon a sentence framed by some one else. I am very certain from the well-earned reputation of the Senator from Massachusetts for literary acquirements, he would not say that the sentence as it is now framed is felicitously framed if his purpose is what he has just indicated. In other words, the first amendment is intended to apply to the second amendment, which is in an intervening clause, which is absolutely inconsistent with it. It seems to me there ought to be such a transposition as will put the first amendment in juxtaposition to the second amendment, if one relates to the other, and that they should not be separated by a foreign subject, which is the case as the clause now stands.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator that it would come in better in line 8.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator's suggestion is a good one.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me, I will move the amendment to come in at that point. I now ask that the amendment in line 6 may be first put, inserting the word "foreign" before the word "vessels."

Mr. BACON. That is better.

Mr. LODGE. That was an obvious omission in the House bill. It was certainly not intended to levy foreign tonnage dues on American vessels.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 3, line 6, before the word "vessels," it is proposed to insert "foreign."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, I propose an amendment in line 8. I have got to put in some additional words there, which do not appear in the print, because, in drafting the amendment, by an oversight a necessary exception in regard to Spanish vessels was omitted. I propose that the amendment in line 8 should read in this way:

And in addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands upon all foreign vessels, except vessels of Spain owned by Spanish subjects, engaged in traffic between the ports of the Philippine Archipelago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 3, line 8, after the word "Archipelago," it is proposed to insert:

And in addition to any tonnage dues or taxes now imposed by the government of the Philippine Islands upon all foreign vessels, except vessels of Spain owned by Spanish subjects, engaged in traffic between the ports of the Philippine Archipelago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Let the next amendment of the committee be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert "or between ports in the Philippine Archipelago."

Mr. LODGE. That proviso is a part of the House bill, and relieves the Philippine trade with the United States from the coastwise laws, and it is necessary for the reason that has already been given; but it omitted to relieve the interisland traffic, and that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will ask the chairman of the committee if it does give to American vessels plying between the United States and the Philippine Islands the benefit of all of our coastwise laws?

Mr. LODGE. No; it is to relieve that traffic from the application of the coastwise laws at the present time. There are no American vessels now engaged in the interisland traffic, and the object is to allow that traffic to go on until the American bottoms or Philippine vessels are able to perform it. The interisland commerce, as I understand it, is practically entirely foreign.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is to place foreign shipping in the Philippine Islands and the United States upon precisely the same footing as the shipping now is between the United States and foreign countries?

Mr. LODGE. That is the necessary result, of course, of relieving it of the coastwise laws. The only discrimination in favor of American bottoms is that in the first part of the section, which has been agreed to, which relieves all American and Philippine vessels from the imposition of tonnage dues of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not, in the anxiety of Senators representing States upon the seacoast, this does not offer a most excellent opportunity to build up and expand American shipping by placing the Philippine Islands in the same category with the coastwise trade, the lake trade, and the fishery trade of the United States, so that within a reasonable period of time, instead of the great bulk of the Philippine traffic being carried in foreign bottoms, it will be transferred exclusively to American bottoms?

Mr. LODGE. I agree entirely with the Senator's purpose, and I hope to see all that trade, both interisland and between the Philippine Islands and the United States, transferred to American bottoms; but at this moment there are no American vessels engaged in that trade. We have got to leave it open for a time, unless we would annihilate the existing commerce of the islands. We have given a discrimination in favor of American vessels by taking off all tonnage dues. I propose to offer a further amendment, which will make a similar discrimination in regard to lighterage and harbor business. I think that is as far as we can now go. Within a very short time we shall be able, I hope, to extend the coastwise laws.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, that matter was in part discussed in the committee, and the suggestion was there made that, admitting the claim to be true that there are now no American vessels engaged in traffic between the United States and the Philippine Islands, if this encouragement were given to them but a very short time would elapse before the energy, the enterprise, and the capital of the United States would supply that traffic with all the American shipping that was necessary. Having that in view, we suggested that a limitation should be put upon this clause, which is under discussion, that this should continue, say, for a period of six months or even a year, so that American capital, knowing that after the expiration of a certain time American vessels could claim the trade, the American shipping would be ample for the purpose.

The reply was made that this was a bill making temporary provision; but so far as any reference to the provision being temporary is concerned, that reference is only in the title of the bill. It was admitted apparently, as a matter of course, that it would be a matter of great importance and of great advantage to the American shipping interests if the shipping should be comprised of American vessels, of American bottoms. We therefore suggested instead of making this a general law that would stand until a new law was enacted, or until Congress should amend this law, that some definite time should be fixed at which the American shipping would take the place of foreign shipping; but that proposition was declined.

So long as the bill is in this form, if it shall be enacted into law, as doubtless it will be, there is no particular hope or promise held out to American capital that next year or the year after or five years from now the change will be made that all apparently admitted would be a desirable one. Therefore it seems to me that it would be wise to amend this section of the bill by putting a limitation of not to exceed one year upon the provisions herein contained.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very glad to see the interest of the Senator from Colorado in the development of the merchant marine, in which I cordially sympathize with him. I hope when this bill is out of the way that he will unite with me in supporting a bill which you, sir, [Mr. FRYE in the chair] have reported to the Senate. I am as anxious as the Senator can be to see this Philippine traffic carried on in American and Philippine vessels. But, Mr. President, to attempt it now everybody concedes would be simply to annihilate the interisland traffic. It would lock up every ship there. So we have got to give them time to get American vessels in.

The Senator, I think, is mistaken about there not being a movement in that direction under existing conditions. A large steamship company in my own State is just completing 2 vessels of over 10,000 tons, which they propose to take around to San Francisco and put into the Philippine trade. A New York company is even now sending out by way of the Suez Canal a fleet of 19 small vessels, all American built, which they propose to use in the interisland traffic; and I think, under the encouragement we are giving in the tonnage dues, in a very short time there will be American bottoms there sufficient to do all the work. We give them encouragement by the discrimination in regard to tonnage dues. We do not want, I think, to limit ourselves as to a specified time, because we may want to change this at the next session. We may find it necessary to have it run for eighteen months or two years; we can meantime keep ourselves informed. A bill of a single line will put those islands at any moment under the coastwise traffic and give a monopoly of the trade to American vessels. It seemed to the majority of the committee that it was wiser to leave it, as the other House left it, without any specific date, because then we can, as I have said, put on the coastwise laws in a month or in twelve months or in six months, according as may seem best.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with the permission of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], if justice to the foreign vessels engaged in this trade would not suggest the propriety of indicating to them the length of time they can continue in it? Otherwise, if they were in the trade, and in a moment, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, we could make them ineligible to engage in that trade, it would certainly produce great hardship. It seems to me in their interest, as well as in that suggested by the Senator from Colorado, it may be very well to have some indication as to how long this condition of affairs will continue.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we are doing any injustice to foreign vessels engaged in the Philippine trade or in trade between the United States and the Philippines or the interisland trade, because they are perfectly aware that it is only a question of a very short time when the coastwise laws will necessarily obtain. They are quite as well informed as we are as to the entrance of American vessels into this trade, and they are engaged in it at their own risk, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to amend section 3, at the close of the section, as follows:

Provided, That at the expiration of one year from the passage of this act all the laws, rules, and regulations now applicable to the American coastwise trade shall apply to American vessels plying between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

I want to say in this connection that I have taken a very decided interest in the betterment of the American coastwise trade and the American shipping interest; but there are different views existing as to the best method for the improvement of that coastwise trade and of the American shipping interest generally. Some Senators seem to labor under the impression that the only way to advance and improve American shipping is by voting immense subsidies to shipping companies; others believe that it may be improved in other and different ways. It seems to me that, if the trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States is to assume the proportions that the friends of the imperialistic policy assert, by placing that traffic in American bottoms one of the greatest conceivable strides will have been made in adding American shipping to the Pacific Ocean.

The assurance of the chairman of the committee that the coastwise laws may in a short time be made applicable to the traffic between the Philippine Islands and the United States does not accomplish the fact. It does not make the laws applicable, and there is no assurance when they will be. It seems to me a time should be fixed, a promise should be given, an assurance should be held out, so that the capital which is ready for investment in American shipping may commence to be utilized now and continue to be used and continue to be invested until, when the time comes, we will have fleets upon the Pacific ample to conduct the traffic between the East and the West. Unless that is done, as the Senator from Georgia suggested, there is danger of injustice to foreign shipowners, while full justice will not be done to American shipowners. Surely the law will not be changed during this Congress, and what assurance have American shipowners that it will be at the next, or the next, or the next succeeding one?

If you now fix a period at which the American coastwise laws are to go into effect there, say the period of one year—a year from to-day Congress will be in session—and if it should then be found, which I do not anticipate, that American shipping will not be sufficient to conduct the business, there can be a further suspension of the operation of the provision. But I am inclined to think that there will be no necessity for that, and I insist that common justice to American shipowners, to American capital, ready to be invested in American shipping, and to foreign shipowners, requires, if the coastwise laws are to be applied to the trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands, that the time when those laws are to go into effect should be stated in this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Where does the Senator from Colorado desire his amendment to come in?

Mr. PATTERSON. At the close of section 3 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the committee's amendment is adopted or before?

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator from Colorado has no objection to the committee amendment inserting the words "or between ports in the Philippine Archipelago."

Mr. PATTERSON. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the committee's amendment is agreed to. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have not written it out. I will state the amendment. It is to insert:

Provided, That at the expiration of one year from the passage of this act all the laws, rules, and regulations relating to American coastwise trade shall apply to vessels plying between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he can reach his object much more simply, I think, by striking out the words "otherwise provided by law" in lines 11 and 12 and inserting a date—whatever date he desires; that this provision shall operate until a certain date, and then the coastwise laws will apply of themselves. I am opposed to the amendment in any form, but I think that is the simpler way of reaching it.

Mr. PATTERSON. If that will accomplish the object, and the Senator from Georgia says it will, I will consent that the suggestion shall be substituted for the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. LODGE. It is to strike out the words "otherwise provided by law," and insert——

Mr. PATTERSON. I move to strike out the words suggested and then to insert "on and after March 1, 1903."

The SECRETARY. In lines 11 and 12, section 3, page 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "otherwise provided by law" and to insert "on and after March 1, 1903;" so that if amended that clause will read:

Provided, however, That until on and after March 1, 1903, the provisions of law restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise directly, etc."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATE. I should like to have the clause read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as it will read if the amendment should be adopted.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, however, That until on and after March 1, 1903—

Mr. LODGE. You do not need the words "on and after." Just say "until March 1, 1903."

The SECRETARY. The clause, if amended, will read as follows:

Provided, however, That until March 1, 1903, the provisions of law restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise, directly or indirectly, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLLIVER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. KEAN (when Mr. DRYDEN's name was called). My colleague is necessarily absent. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] that he transfer his pair to my colleague.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], with whom I am paired, has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair is informed that the Senator from Minnesota has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has voted?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He has not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the junior senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ELKINS. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. ELKINS. I am paired with him. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. KEARNS. I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. KEARNS. I am paired with the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SCOTT (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] has not voted.

Mr. MORGAN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bacon,	Clark, Mont.	Jones, Ark.	Teller,
Bard,	Clay,	Mallory,	Tillman,
Bate,	Cockrell,	Martin,	Vest.
Berry,	Culberson,	Patterson,
Carmack,	Heitfeld,	Pettus.

NAYS—34.

Aldrich,	Elkins,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Allison,	Foraker,	McComas,	Quarles,
Beveridge,	Frye,	McCumber,	Simon,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	McEnery,	Spooner,
Burton,	Gamble,	Millard,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Wellington,
Depew,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Dillingham,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.
Dolliver,	Kittredge,	Platt, N. Y.

NOT VOTING—36.

Bailey,	Dubois,	Jones, Nev.	Penrose,
Blackburn,	Fairbanks,	Kearns,	Pritchard,
Burnham,	Foster, La.	McLaurin, Miss.	Quay,
Clapp,	Foster, Wash.	McLaurin, S. C.	Rawlins,

Daniel,	Hale,	Mason,	Simmons,
Deboe,	Hanna,	Mitchell,	Taliaferro,
Dietrich,	Harris,	Money,	Turner,
Dryden,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Warren.

So Mr. PATTERSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. I now offer an amendment to come in as an additional proviso at the end of section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 3, on page 3, the following:

And provided further, That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to all vessels or other craft now engaged in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business, but after the passage of this act such licenses except as herein provided shall be issued only to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me the amendment ought to be printed before we act on it. It is quite an important amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment is simply intended to give reasonable protection to native boats and to the boats which have been sent out in considerable numbers, I understand, from this country to take part in the lighterage and harbor business. The unloading of all large ships at Manila is now necessarily done by lighters. Small vessels, intended solely for that purpose, but with improved machinery, which will make a great difference in the rapidity with which vessels are unloaded, have been sent from this country to be used in that business. There are also a number of native boats now engaged in it and a number of foreign boats. These are not disturbed. All the boats now engaged in business are entitled to have a license, but after this date the lighterage and harbor business is to be confined to vessels owned and built in the Philippines or in the United States.

The information which came to me was so conclusive that if we did not put in some provision in regard to licenses we should be flooded with boats sent over from Hongkong and manned by Chinese that it seemed to me it was absolutely necessary to do something of this sort, and the license seemed to be the only way to protect the native and American people engaged in that business.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 3, on page 3, the following:

And provided further, That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to all vessels or other craft now engaged in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business, but after the passage of this act such licenses, except as herein provided, shall be issued only to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to emphasize the suggestion, made by the Senator from Colorado, that this amendment is of such consequence that it ought to be printed and go over so that it may be considered.

In this connection I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this amendment has never been considered by the committee at all.

Mr. LODGE. It has not.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I have stated.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator asked me a question. I beg his pardon.

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, no. I was making the statement to the Senate that this particular amendment has never received the consideration of the committee, and it seems to me it is of such importance that it ought to be printed and lie over, so that Senators may have an opportunity to examine it in connection with the entire bill. I trust the Senator in charge of the measure will allow that course to be taken.

Mr. LODGE. The matter was brought to my attention after the bill had been reported. It was such a very small and simple matter that I did what is frequently done here on appropriation bills and other bills with an amendment suggested after a bill has been reported—I prepared it. I showed it to one or two members of the committee. It seemed to me wholly unnecessary to call a committee meeting for the purpose of submitting that amendment, and I ventured to offer it on my own responsibility.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if much of this transportation of passengers and merchandise between the islands is not almost like harbor transportation? If it is so, is not the rule which is prescribed in the bill, providing that any foreign-built vessels may engage in that traffic, as obnoxious as it would be to the lightering business done in Manila Harbor? Manila Harbor, I understand, is quite a large body of water.

Mr. LODGE. The language "engaged in traffic between ports of the Philippine Archipelago" certainly can not cover, as this explicitly covers, the harbor business and the lighterage business of one harbor. "Lighterage and exclusively harbor business" does not mean traffic between ports.

Mr. MALLORY. I admit that, Mr. President; but the harbor of Manila is an exceptional harbor, and I understand vessels of any considerable draft of water can not approach to within some miles of the town of Manila. The bay of Manila is a very large sheet of water. It is not like the bay of New York. It is much larger, and it requires vessels of considerable size to navigate that bay.

Now, if it is possible to build vessels in Manila or in Luzon and in the United States which are fitted for the business of lighterage in Manila Bay, why is it not also possible that the same style of vessels, small steam vessels, can be built at Manila or in other parts of the Philippine Islands, and permitted to carry on the passenger and freight transportation business between the islands under the American flag and subject to the rules prescribed for our domestic commerce? In other words, I do not see why there should be a distinction as to this particular traffic, and why there should not be a distinction in the insular traffic.

Mr. LODGE. Traffic between the islands?

Mr. MALLORY. I merely suggest that, because it occurs to me, without really having investigated the subject at all, that if there is to be a distinction between these two kinds of craft in the trade in the Philippine Islands, we should understand why the distinction should be made. I confess I do not now see it.

Mr. LODGE. The difficulty, I understand, is this: With the passage of a bill which for the time being allows the entry of foreign vessels, there will be no serious change in the commerce between the islands, because the vessels there employed have been there for some time. It is an established trade among the islands, and there is no great room for introducing new ones. But with the assurance that for a short time at least the coastwise laws will not apply, but that they are to apply before long, there is an expectation that there will be a great many small boats fit only for lighterage, brought over by the Chinese from Hongkong and other Chinese ports, to take possession of the lighterage business in Manila and possibly elsewhere. But Manila is the principal point. The amendment is made necessary by the passage of the bill itself.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the point of the Senator from Florida to be that vessels of such a size will be required on account of the size of the bay of Manila, that they might also be used for inter-island trade, and therefore there should be no special permission given for craft of this kind. The Senator is under a misapprehension. The ocean-going vessels that take goods to Manila can come within a very short distance of the city. They do not discharge at the keys, but within a very short distance, and the freight is discharged into what are called cascos, which are hauled in by very small tugs, utterly inappropriate for interisland commerse.

The same thing is true of the next largest port in the islands—Iloilo.

It is for this reason that the amendment is required. Vessels of the size required for the interisland traffic would not be at all appropriate for the purposes to which this amendment is directed, and it was because it was expected that Chinese from Hongkong and other places would monopolize this lighterage business that the amendment is offered. I make these remarks simply because the Senator's suggestion, which has weight and substance to it, is based upon a misapprehension of the depth of water and the nature of the two harbors.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator tell me, if he can, what the depth of water is that can be taken up to the city of Manila in the river?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The depth of water in the river?

Mr. MALLORY. Vessels of what draft can enter?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would not undertake to state with the accuracy of a foot or an inch in the river itself.

Mr. MALLORY. Approximately.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But vessels of considerable size, it is true, can come to private wharves in the Pasig, in Manila itself, but ocean-going steamers discharge in the bay, not, however, as the Senator supposes, at a great distance from it. On the contrary. it is a very short distance—a mile, a half mile, even. Therefore the size of vessels required to do this lighterage work, both in Manila and in the bay at Iloilo, are not of the ocean-going size that he supposes. They are very small.

Mr. MALLORY. The point that occurred to me is this: If it is necessary to throw protection around our domestic vessels and vessels built in the Philippine Islands for this purpose, why should we not also encourage the building of vessels in the Philippine Islands for the interisland trade? I do not think it is necessary that there should be such a very large vessel to engage in trade between the islands of the Philippines. Everything on the subject we have here indicates that only small vessels can successfully engage in the interisland traffic in the Philippines.

Now, if only small vessels can do so, and only small vessels can engage in this lighterage business, why should we protect the small vessels that are engaged in the harbor of Manila or in the bay of Manila and not encourage the building of vessels of similar size at least for the interisland traffic?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator overlooks the fact that we give protection by discrimination in the tonnage dues to vessels engaged in the inter-island traffic, but we give no discrimination whatever in favor of the small vessels engaged in lighterage and exclusively harbor business.

Mr. MALLORY. But, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, if vessels can be used in private business, as he suggests, and as I believe is done, or is proposed to be done at all events, then they get the benefit of the license, because they engage in harbor business and also in inter-island traffic. If they engage only in the inter-island traffic they get the benefit of the discrimination in the first part of the section. But if there is nothing put on about lighterage, I have been informed by persons whom I thought understood the question that there was great danger of the lighterage business passing largely into the hands of the Chinese and Japanese after the passage of this bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The local business.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to telling the Senator where the suggestion came from. The matter was first brought to my attention, and it was in regard to that that I drafted the amendment, by the company or the gentlemen who are taking out the 19 vessels I spoke of—the New York Company. They said that they were perfectly willing to take them out and start them under existing conditions in the interisland traffic, but that a portion of their fleet which they took out, which was for lighterage alone, would receive no benefit from the discriminating tonnage, and they apprehend that after the passage of this bill there would be a tendency on the part of the Chinese and the Japanese to come in from Hongkong and deprive them of the opportunity which they sought—to do the harbor business.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him right there if there is danger of Chinese and Japanese coming in and monopolizing the business with small vessels in the bay of Manila, is there not also some risk that the Chinese and Japanese, as the provisions of this bill permit foreign-built vessels to go into the interisland traffic, will come in and do the same thing?

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest, as I understand. The Chinese and Japanese they do not apprehend will get into the inter-island traffic or build vessels of that character, but they will build cascoes and small boats simply for lighterage and harbor work.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has information as to the present system of licensing boats there?

Mr. LODGE. License, I understand, is now issued by the authorities at Manila, as is done in all our ports.

Mr. BACON. As to all classes of boats, even down to the very smallest?

Mr. LODGE. To all boats plying in harbor business.

Mr. BACON. Down to the very smallest?

Mr. LODGE. I understand so.

Mr. BACON. The point to which I wish to call attention especially is the possible necessity of guarding this amendment against what might work a different result from that which the Senator designs. It depends altogether upon what the word "harbor" would be construed to include as to whether my suggestion is of any point. If, by the word "harbor," the bay of Manila is included, then there would be excluded from a good deal of ordinary traffic vessels which are otherwise authorized by this bill to engage in that traffic.

The bay of Manila is almost an inland sea, and if that is intended to be described by the term "harbor," if the word "harbor" includes the whole of that bay, then there are four or five towns on the shores of the bay in which no vessel could engage in traffic between them unless it fell within the class named in this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The phrase is, the Senator will note, "exclusively harbor business."

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. "Now engaged in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business." I think I am right in saying that harbor business is a perfectly understood technical term. It does not mean traffic between ports.

Mr. BACON. I think with that statement by the Senator, made in this connection, it would be construed according to his statement if there was any question ever raised.

Mr. LODGE. If there is traffic between ports—one port in Bataan, the province opposite the bay, and a port in Manila—I suppose that would be traffic between inter-island ports. It is certainly not harbor business. Harbor business is towing and lightering work and everything of the kind.

Mr. BACON. The statement of the Senator sufficiently explains the meaning, I think, and I presume that that construction would follow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move the next committee amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was, in section 4, on page 3, line 20, after the word "act," to strike out "less the cost of collecting the same;" in line 21, after the word "and," to strike out "the gross amount of;" in the same line, after the word "all," to strike out "collections of;" in line 22, after the word "taxes," to insert "collected;" and in line 24, after the word "upon," to insert "foreign;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the duties and taxes collected in the Philippine Archipelago in pursuance of this act, and all duties and taxes collected in the United States upon articles coming from the Philippine Archipelago and upon foreign vessels coming therefrom, shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States, but shall be held as a separate fund and paid into the treasury of the Philippine Islands, to be used and expended for the government and benefit of said islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, on page 5, line 4, after the word "where," to strike out "imported;" so as to make the paragraph read:

That where materials on which duties have been paid are used in the manufacture of articles manufactured or produced in the United States there shall be allowed on the shipment of said articles to the Philippine Archipelago a drawback equal in amount to the duties paid on the materials used, less 1 per cent of such duties, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 10, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 7. That merchandise in bonded warehouse or otherwise in the custody and control of the officers of the customs, upon which duties have been paid, shall be entitled, on shipment to the Philippine Islands within three years from the date of the original arrival, to a return of the duties paid less 1 per cent, and merchandise upon which duties have not been paid may be shipped without the payment of duties to the Philippine Islands within said period, under such bonds and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire from the Senator why that term is made so long—three years?

Mr. LODGE. This section was prepared by the Treasury Department as necessary to the administration of the drawbacks provided for in the bill. It was copied, I think, exactly from the similar administrative provisions in our own customs tariff. It is a usual provision in regard to merchandise in bond.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. The question I asked the Senator was whether that is the usual time, three years.

Mr. LODGE. That is my impression. I have not compared that particular point with our tariff, but the section was prepared at the Treasury Department, and I assumed that they had taken the usual term. I can say to the Senator I can look it up, for I have the tariff here, and tell him what the usual term is.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that, of course, if that is the usual provision there is no special criticism to be made upon the same one being incorporated here, but in the absence of that and in the first blush it might seem that persons who imported goods into this country with a view of exportation to the Philippine Islands could do so in very much less time than three years, and the longer the lapse of time, the Senator will readily recognize, the greater the opportunity there may be for fraud.

Of course, if that has been the time heretofore recognized by the law and the recommendation of the Treasury Department as a reasonable time for similar privileges, then I have nothing to say about it; but in the absence of that it does occur to me that to say a man can import articles into this country and keep them for three years before he determines to export them to the Philippines is rather a broad liberty. I wish to say in this connection that I am not in favor of their having to pay those duties at any time, but if there is going to be a regulation of that kind, it seems to me it ought to be of a kind to be effective and to guard against imposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo. The Chair thinks it is in response to the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] in relation to the punishment of certain crimes, treason, etc., in the Philippine Archipelago. It will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. CULBERSON. It appears to be in answer to a different resolution from the one I introduced, but I presume that that is the proper reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also presents a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to the resolution of the 22d ultimo transmitting "copies of all suggestions, statements, criticisms, and correspondence between the War Department or any official thereof and any person or corporation relating to the customs tariff affecting the Philippine Islands which culminated in the tariff adopted by the Philippine Commission September 17, 1901." It will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should like to have the report from the Secretary of War as to the law passed by the Philippine Commission read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is returned is simply a printed law, I take it.

Mr. PATTERSON. The answer must necessarily be a very short one as to whether that law is in fact a law, or is an alleged law. We might just as well have the information now from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read it.

Mr. TELLER. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entire law is sent in by the Secretary of War in answer to the resolution. What will the Senator have read?

Mr. FORAKER. Let the entire communication be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 4, 1902.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the Senate dated January 31, 1902, reading:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to inform the Senate if the following has been passed by the Philippine Commission, and is being enforced as a law in said islands, and persons punished thereunder, and the date of the promulgation of such order, namely:

(No. 292. By the United States Philippine Commission.)

"SEC. 2. Every person owing allegiance to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands and having knowledge of any treason against them, or either of them, who conceals and does not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the provincial governor in the province in which he resides, or to the civil governor of the islands, or to some judge of a court of record, is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years, and be fined not more than $1,000."

"SEC. 8. Every person who shall utter seditious words or speeches; write, publish, or circulate scurrilous libels against the Government of the United States or the insular government of the Philippine Islands, or which tend to disturb or obstruct any lawful officer in executing his office, or which tend to instigate others to cabal or meet together for unlawful purposes, or which suggest or incite rebellious conspiracies or riots, or which tend to stir up the people against the lawful authorities or to disturb the peace of the community, the safety and order of the government, or who shall knowingly conceal such evil practices, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 9. All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form, any secret society, or who shall, after the passage of this act, continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object, in whole or in part, the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"SEC. 10. Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands it shall be unlawful for any persons to advocate orally, or by writing or printing, or like methods, the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation.

"Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year."

I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of act No. 292, passed by the United States Philippine Commission, as certified to the War Department, and to inform you that this Department has not been advised that any person has been punished for violation of said act, nor that proceedings have been instituted against any person for an alleged violation thereof.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE UNITED STATES SENATE.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to inquire if the statement just read, which I heard after the first line or two of it had been read, is a statement of what is the actual law in the Philippine Islands or only a statement of some alleged or proposed law?

Mr. RAWLINS. The request was to have the act transmitted read. That has not yet been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication just read is in response to the resolution offered by the Senator from Utah. The Secretary of War has sent the legislation which was sent to the Department from the Philippine Archipelago, and that has not been read.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If I understood that correctly, a wife knowing of what is alleged to be the treason of a husband, or a husband knowing what is alleged to be the treason of a wife, or a mother knowing what is alleged to be the treason of a son, or a son knowing the treason of a mother, and so on, of the son and the father and the brother—the person knowing that and not acting as an informer to the government is, under a law imposed by the authority of United States, to be punished by seven years imprisonment. I should like to know whether that is true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the request was made that the return of the Secretary of War should be read——

Mr. TELLER. That is what we want, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Inclosure.]

No. 292.—An act defining the crimes of treason, insurrection, sedition, conspiracies to commit such crimes, seditious utterances whether written or spoken, the formation of secret political societies, the administering or taking of oaths to commit crimes or to prevent the discovering of the same, and the violation of oaths of allegiance, and prescribing punishment therefor.

By authority of the President of the United States, be it enacted by the United States Philippine Commission, that: SECTION 1. Every person resident in the Philippine Islands, owing allegiance to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands, who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the Philippine Islands or elsewhere, is guilty of treason, and upon conviction shall suffer death or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000.

SEC. 2. Every person, owing allegiance to to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands, and having knowledge of any treason against them or either of them, who conceals, and does not as soon as may be disclose and make known the same to the provincial governor in the province in which he resides or to the civil governor of the islanus or to some judge of a court of record, is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years and be fined not more than $1,000.

SEC. 3. Every person who incites, sets on foot, assists or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or of the government of the Philippine Islands, or the laws thereof, or who gives aid or comfort to anyone so engaging in such rebellion or insurrection, shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned for not more than ten years and be fined not more than $10,000.

SEC. 4. If two or more persons conspire to overthrow, put down, or destroy by force the Government of the United States in the Philippine Islands or the government of the Philippine Islands, or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States or of the Philippine Islands, or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States or of the government of the Philippine Islands contrary to the authority thereof, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 and by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a period not more than six years.

SEC. 5. All persons who rise publicly and tumultuously in order to obtain by force or outside of legal methods any of the following objects are guilty of sedition:

1. To prevent the promulgation or execution of any law or the free holding of any popular election.

2. To prevent the insular government or any provincial or municipal government or any public official from freely exercising its or his duties, or the due execution of any judicial or administrative order.

3. To inflict any act of hate or revenge upon the person or property of any official or agent of the insular government or of a provincial or municipal government.

4. To inflict, with a political or social object, any act of hate or revenge upon individuals or upon any class of individuals in the islands.

5. To despoil, with a political or social object, any class of persons, natural or artificial, a municipality, a province, or the insular government, or the Government of the United States or any part of its property.

SEC. 6. Any person guilty of sedition, as defined in section 5 hereof, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or both.

SEC. 7. All persons conspiring to commit the crime of sedition shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both.

SEC. 8. Every person who shall utter seditious words or speeches, write, publish, or circulate scurrilous libels against the Government of the United States or the insular government of the Philippine Islands, or which tend to disturb or obstruct any lawful officer in executing his office, or which tend to instigate others to cabal or meet together for unlawful purposes, or which suggest or incite rebellious conspiracies or riots, or which tend to stir up the people against the lawful authorities or to disturb the peace of the community, the safety and order of the Government, or who shall knowingly conceal such evil practices, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 9. All persons who shall meet together for the purpose of forming, or who shall form any secret society, or who shall after the passage of this act continue membership in a society already formed, having for its object in whole or in part the promotion of treason, rebellion, or sedition, or the promulgation of any political opinion or policy, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 10. Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands, it shall be unlawful for any person to advocate orally or by writing or printing or like methods the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

SEC. 11. Every person who shall administer, or be present and consent to the administering of, any oath or any engagement purporting to bind the person taking the same to commit any crime punishable by death or by imprisonment for five years or more, or who shall attempt to induce or compel any person to take any such oath or engagement or who shall himself take any such oath or engagement, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding ten years.

SEC. 12. Any person who administers, or who is present at, and consenting to, the administering of any oath or engagement purporting to bind the person taking the same, either—

1. To engage in any seditious purpose; or

2. To disturb the public peace or commit or endeavor to commit any criminal offense; or

3. To fail or refuse to inform and give evidence against any associate, confederate, or other person; or

4. To fail or refuse to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy or any illegal act done or to be done or any illegal oath or obligation or engagement which may have been administered or tendered to or taken by any person or the import of any such oath, obligation, or engagement.

And likewise anyone who attempts to induce or compel any person to take any such oath or engagement, and likewise any person who takes any such oath or engagement shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both.

SEC. 13. Any person who, under such compulsion as would otherwise excuse him, offends against either of the last two preceding sections shall not be excused thereby, unless within the periods hereinafter stated he declares the same, and what he knows touching the same, and the persons by whom such oath or obligation or engagement was administered or taken, by information upon oath before a justice of the peace, judge of a court of first instance, or provincial fiscal of the municipality or province in which such oath or engagement was administered or taken. Such declaration may be made by him within fourteen days after the commission of the offense, or, if he is hindered from making it, by actual force or sickness, then within eight days after cessation of such hindrance, or on his trial, if that happens before the expiration of either of those periods.

SEC. 14. Any person who shall have taken any oath before any military officer of the Army of the United States or before any officer under the civil government of the Philippine Islands, whether such official so administering the oath was specially authorized by law so to do or not, in which oath the affiant in substance engaged to recognize or accept the supreme authority of the United States of America in these islands or to maintain true faith and allegiance thereto or to obey the laws, legal orders, and decrees promulgated by its duly constituted authorities, and who shall, after the passage of this act, violate the terms and provisions of such oath or any of such terms or provisions, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or both.

SEC. 15. The provisions of this act shall not apply to the organized provinces of Batangas, Cebu, and Bohol, nor to any province where civil government has not been established, so long as insurrection against the authority of the United States exists therein, unless the commanding general of the Army of the United States, division of the Philippines, shall authorize and direct prosecutions in the civil courts in such territories for offenses under this act, in which event it shall apply.

SEC. 16. All laws and parts of laws now in force, so far as the same may be in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate as a repeal of existing laws in so far as they are applicable to pending actions or existing causes of actions, but as to such causes of actions, or pending actions, existing laws shall remain in full force and effect, this act being entirely prospective.

SEC. 17. A foreigner, residing in the Philippine Islands, who shall commit any of the crimes specified in the preceding sections of this act, except those specified in sections 1 and 2, shall be punished in the same way and with the same penalty as that prescribed for the particular crime therein.

SEC. 18. This act shall take effect on its passage.

Enacted November 4, 1901.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk the Revised Statutes, and ask that sections 5331 to 5338, both inclusive, may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5331. Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason.

SEC. 5332. Every person guilty of treason shall suffer death; or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, to be levied on and collected out of any or all of his property, real and personal, of which he was the owner at the time of committing such treason, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding; and every person so convicted of treason shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

SEC. 5333. Every person owing allegiance to the United States and having knowledge of the commission of any treason against them, who conceals, and does not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the President or to some judge of the United States, or to the governor, or to some judge or justice of a particular State, is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years and fined not more than $1,000.

SEC. 5334. Every person who incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or gives aid or comfort thereto, shall be punished by imprisonment not more than ten years or by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by both of such punishments; and shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

SEC. 5335. Every citizen of the United States, whether actually resident or abiding within the same or in any foreign country, who, without the permission or authority of the Government, directly or indirectly, commences or carries on any verbal or written correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government or any officer or agent thereof, with an intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States or to defeat the measures of the Government of the United States; and every person, being a citizen of, or resident within, the United States, and not duly authorized, who counsels, advises, or assists in any such correspondence, with such intent, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months nor more than three years; but nothing in this section shall be construed to abridge the right of a citizen to apply himself or his agent to any foreign government or the agents thereof for redress of any injury which he may have sustained from such government or any of its agents or subjects.

SEC. 5336. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to overthrow, put down, or to destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against them, or to oppose by force the authority thereof; or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States; or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof; each of them shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not more than $5,000; or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a period not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 5337. Every person who recruits soldiers or sailors within the United States to engage in armed hostility against the same, or who opens within the United States a recruiting station for the enlistment of such soldiers or sailors, to serve in any manner in armed hostility against the United States, shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than one year nor more than five years.

SEC. 5338. Every soldier or sailor enlisted or engaged within the United States, with intent to serve in armed hostility against the same, shall be punished by a fine of $100 and by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than three years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication which has been read will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Philippines, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If my colleague will allow me, I simply want to make a verbal change in the pending amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment of the committee, which is now section 7, on page 5, line 18, reads, "under such bonds and regulations." That is a misprint. I want it changed so as to read, "under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury." If that amendment can be disposed of, I shall be obliged, for that will conclude all the committee amendments. We can then have a new print of the bill as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. It is merely to correct a misprint.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. If my colleage has got through, I desire to take the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I just want to dispose of this last amendment, which will conclude the committee amendments, and then the bill can be printed as amended.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not the bill still open to amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; this only disposes of the committee amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I will not propose to reprint the bill now, because the Senator from Wisconsin has an amendment to offer, which I shall be very glad to accept.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee inserting section 7 as it has been amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. That concludes the committee amendments, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts, but I have an amendment that I want to take up at the proper time.

Mr. LODGE. All I said was that the last amendment agreed to concluded the committee amendments.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I propose to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to what seems to me an exceedingly harsh and cruel provision of this law, if it is to be called a law, which has just been read, and to say that I am sorry that the Philippine Commissioners seemed to have stopped with the only harsh and cruel provision which is to be found in our own statutes in regard to treason.

Under this provision, as I said just now, the mother must complain of the son; the son must complain of the mother; the father must complain of the child; and the husband must complain of the wife, under a severe penalty. Why, Mr. President, an eminent doctor of divinity was charged before the civil war with having said that he would send his mother into slavery if that were necessary to save the Union, and a spasm of horror went through the whole country. The statement that he had said so was denied, and he said that it was his brother that he said he would send into slavery. Many people thought that that was not much better.

But this provision, which in the United States statute only applies to persons committing such an offense against their own country—to whose allegiance they were born and bred, or whose oath of allegiance, if born elsewhere, they have voluntarily taken—was never applied here, and I do not believe it will be found in the history of human cruelty that it has been applied anywhere to the case of one people undertaking to subjugate another people by conquest where a whole people believe they are entitled as of right to their liberty and independence. But here, at least, hard as it would be, it is mitigated by the fact that the offense both of the traitor and of the person charged with misprision of treason is to be tried by a jury of the peers and fellow-citizens of the person charged and in a district previously ascertained where the offense was committed. This is to be put in execution by an alien authority, by courts—not by juries—paid by an alien power and responsible to alien direction and command.

I do not mean to debate this question much until the case which is to be made up for us by our committee of investigation comes in; but as I have called attention to this one fact as it went in, I wish to call attention also now for a moment to a provision not found in any United States statute; a provision which, if it were attempted to be incorporated in any United States statute, would hurl from power at once by a general storm of popular indignation the government that should undertake to enact it; and that is, that any secret society formed for the purpose of advocating any political opinion whatsoever renders all its membership liable to imprisonment as an offense against the state.

Why, Mr. President, we were told, when we were first asked to enter upon this unhappy career in which the country has been embarked, that we were to give such an example of a perfect, mild, humane, and advanced government abroad that we should adopt it at home as a model for ourselves; and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] said in an impassioned speech that he looked for great improvement in our defective and faulty national legislation at home from the example we were to set to mankind when we got started in the Philippine Islands. So far we have this example for our improvement—the application of the harshest doctrine of misprision of treason known to human statute books, without a jury trial, administered by alien courts, responsible to an alien government, of an enactment that a secret society formed for the purpose of advocating any political opinion whatsoever renders its membership punishable like felons! That is the improvement which we are invited to adopt at home.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to relieve at least one member of the Philippine Commission from a part of the odium of this law?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Governor Taft before the Philippine Committee had his attention directed to this law. He stated that when it was passed he was sick in bed, and that had he been there doubtless there would have been at least a modification of it.

Mr. HOAR. I am quite ready to believe of that honorable and humane gentleman that what the Senator has said is true.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] immediately after this Philippine statute was read had read the statute of the United States on the subject of treason, providing what should be treason, and in that only following the constitutional provision——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me one moment? I forgot one thing, being interrupted, which I was just about to say. May I add it before the Senator proceeds?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say that here treason against the United States consists only in the actual levying of war against the Government or giving aid and comfort to its enemies, while treason in the Philippine Islands is a very different thing.

Mr. BACON. I had it in mind to make the same statement—that the United States statute but follows the definition of treason which is given in the Constitution of the United States, which limits treason to the acts therein specified. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] had these statutes read, I say, Mr. President, intending thereby, I suppose, to make it appear that this remarkable Philippine act was substantially a copy of that act. The truth is that they are as wide apart as the poles, for the reason just suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. There is a copying of the penalties, but an entire difference as to the offenses for which those penalties shall be inflicted.

Mr. President, it is not the time now to discuss it, but I should like in this connection, in view of the suggestion I have made, that the purpose of the Senator must have been to show such a correspondence between the two as to find a justification for the Philippine act in the statute of the United States—in view of that I desire, if the Senator will pardon me, to ask him the question, so that we may have as direct an answer as his convenience will permit, whether he approves of the Philippine statute which has been read here to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I supposed when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] concluded that I would be given an opportunity to answer him; but, inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] got the floor before I was aware that the Senator from Massachusetts had quit it, I rise now only to say in response to that question that as soon as the Senator concludes, if I may be permitted the privilege of the floor, I will then make answer to the question he has propounded or any other he may see fit to ask in regard to this matter. Is the Senator through?

Mr. BACON. I sat down.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well; but I thought you sat down in deference to myself rather than because you had concluded.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I wish to suggest a matter which is pertinent to what has been stated, so that the Senator from Ohio may answer in connection with the communication from the Secretary of War, if he will permit me.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, it developed in the examination before the Philippine Committee that there are three political parties in the Philippine Islands, particularly in Manila. One is the Federal party, which virtually promises statehood at some future time to the Philippine Islands. The other principal party was the partido conservador, or the Conservative party, which, according to the testimony of Governor Taft, has for its platform, first, peace, and then peaceful agitation for the independence of the Philippine Islands. Governor Taft told us of the wonderful advance——

Mr. FORAKER. I yielded to the Senator from Colorado because I thought he wanted to ask a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I shall be through in a very few minutes.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to yield for a few minutes. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think you will see the pertinency of what I am about to say, and I believe you would like to answer what I shall suggest.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. PATTERSON. Governor Taft stated the wonderful progress of the Federal party. The Conservative party, he said, was not of much moment; that it had no membership of any account outside of Manila, and was not progressing in Manila.

Then, with reference to this law, he was asked whether or not the advocacy of the platform of the Conservative party, which was absolute peace first and then peaceful agitation for independence, did not make the members of that party subject to the denunciation of the law which has just been read, and he stated that he supposed it did.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. PATTERSON. The question is whether or not the Senator approves of that procedure as well as of the law which has been read.

Mr. FORAKER. I never saw this Philippine statute, and I never heard it read until it was read from the Secretary's desk a few minutes ago. I heard some comments upon it in this Chamber a few days ago, when the resolution in response to which it has been sent here was offered and adopted, and I heard the recitals of that resolution at that time. I heard also just now, as the letter from the Secretary of War was being read, the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

I discovered from his remarks that he was very much disturbed mentally, morally, and otherwise because of a certain provision in this statute, namely, that which (to use his language as near as I can recall it) made it the duty of a wife to disclose to a proper official named treason contemplated or about to be committed or having been committed by her husband, or made it the duty of the child to so inform upon the parent, or of a sister to inform upon her brother, and vice versa; and I understood him to say that was unprecedented, and he wanted to know whether or not it was possible that legislation of that character had been enacted under and by the authority of the United States.

It occurred to me in that connection to send for the Revised Statutes and then call the attention of the Senate to the fact, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts, that these United States Statutes, enacted by the American Congress, had so provided, not for the Filipinos, but for the people of the United States; and as I read through our own statute on the subject of treason and listened to the reading of the Philippine statute as it was read at the Secretary's desk, I discovered what I now want to particularly call attention to, that not alone, as has been suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], are the penalties practically the same, but the definitions and general provisions are almost identical

In other words, Mr. President, it is apparent, from a reading and comparison of these two statutes, that the Philippine Commission, in enacting the statute now under consideration for the Philippines, had before them our own statute, as it has now been read from the Secretary's desk from the Revised Statutes of the United States. They have simply adopted its language and its general purport, adding thereto other matters possibly—for I have not had time to read it, but only to hear it read—applicable to the Philippine Islands, and matters that were not applicable here; but of them presently.

For the present, I content myself with calling attention—and inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States has been referred to, I want to call attention to that also—to the similarity, I was about to say, of our statute here and the Philippine statute. It has been said that our statute is but an interpretation and definition more elaborately given of the constitutional provision on the subject.

Mr. President, the constitutional provision on this subject is very short. It is very comprehensive, however. Without this statute we would have no law defining treason or providing for the punishment of treason when committed. The statute was necessary in order to put into the form of law that which by our organic law was made a crime against government in this country. Section 3 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

The rest of the section has relation to conviction, etc., and it is not necessary to read it now. Such is the constitutional definition of treason in this country. It shall consist only in levying war against the United States or in giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States.

Now let us see what the statute contains. The necessity for a statute was not to define what levying war consisted of, but what constituted giving aid to the enemies of the United States. It will be obvious, as attention is called to this statute, that the language in the Constitution did not make necessary all the provisions of this statute, but that they were found by our experience in government to be necessary in order properly to punish the different phases of the offense of giving aid and comfort to our enemies, which was by the Constitution prohibited.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. He does not state that with precise accuracy. It is not giving aid and comfort. It is "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

Mr. FORAKER. "Or in adhering to their enemies."

Mr. HOAR. "Giving them aid and comfort."

Mr. FORAKER. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to the fact that I was not with exact accuracy quoting the language that I was intending to quote. The provision itself defines its purpose. The language is:

> Or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

In other words, the Constitution undertook to define what was meant by "adhering" to the enemies of the United States. By "adhering" to the enemies of the United States was meant giving them aid or comfort. That is the way I understand it, and that is why I was reading it as I did, my understanding being that treason against the United States consists in levying war against the United States or adhering to the enemies of the United States, to wit, giving them aid and comfort. That is what "adhering" means in the constitutional sense.

Now, having the constitutional provision before us, let me read section 5331, and as I read this statute I want to read the corresponding sections of the Philippine statute:

> SEC. 5331. Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason.

This is but a reenactment of the constitutional provision on the subject.

That act was first passed in 1790; so it is a statute of rather respectable age. Section 5332 provides:

> Every person guilty of treason shall suffer death; or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, to be levied on and collected out of any or all of his property, real and personal, of which he was the owner at the time of committing such treason, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding; and every person so convicted of treason shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

I will read one other section of the Revised Statutes before I compare it with the Philippine statute. It is the section to which I called the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts particularly as answering his remarks made in the Senate before I introduced the Revised Statutes, when he wanted to know whether or not under the authority of the United States any statute had ever been passed making it the duty of a wife to inform on the husband, or of a child to inform on the parent, etc. This is as follows:

> SEC. 5333. Every person owing allegiance to the United States and having knowledge of the commission of any treason against them, who conceals, and does not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the President or to some judge of the United States, or to the governor, or to some judge or justice of a particular State, is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years, and fined not more than $1,000.

Now let me read from the Philippine statute:

> SECTION 1. Every person resident in the Philippine Islands owing allegiance to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands who levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the Philippine Islands or elsewhere, is guilty of treason, and upon conviction shall suffer death or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000.

You will observe that it is almost identically the language of our own statute, making only such difference in the text as is necessary to make it applicable to the Philippine Islands particularly.

Now, section 2 reads as follows:

> Every person owing allegiance to the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands and having knowledge of any treason against them or either of them who conceals and does not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the provincial governor in the province in which he resides or to the civil governor of the islands or to some judge of a court of record is guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not more than seven years and be fined not more than $1,000.

I call the attention not only of the Senator from Massachusetts, but also of the Senator from Georgia, to the fact that this section is in identically the same language as the section which has been quoted from our Revised Statutes; not in identically the same language as to the penalty to be imposed, but in identically the same language in defining the crime for which the penalty is to be imposed, viz: Whoever having knowledge of treason does not disclose the same as soon as may be shall be guilty thus and so and be fined thus and so.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask in this connection——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio, as my friend the Senator from Maine is in the habit of saying, right here, whether he approves of that provision as applicable to the Philippine Islands or whether he agrees with Governor Taft, as has been reported here?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what Governor Taft has said, but I approve of this provision without any qualification whatever. Now, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he approves of this section of the Revised Statutes of the United States which I have just read, and why, if he does, he takes such exception to its counterpart when applied to the Philippines?

Mr. HOAR. I do not.

Mr. FORAKER. You do not approve of it as applied to the United States?

Mr. HOAR. You ask me a question, and I will answer it.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. Wait.

Mr. FORAKER. I have the answer. Now, let me ask another question.

Mr. HOAR. You have not yet the answer.

Mr. FORAKER. I asked for an answer, and I have it, and now I want to follow it up with another question.

Mr. HOAR. I say I had not completed my answer; which knows better, the Senator from Ohio or I? He asked me a question——

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. HOAR. He got part of the answer, and he says I have completed it.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator that he may complete his answer, if he so desires.

Mr. HOAR. I do not agree with the statute of the United States. I think that the statute of the United States including mothers and wives and children is a harsh one; but in our circumstances, with respect to treason likely to have been committed within the contemplation of the authors of that statute, such a thing would never practically happen.

But here, going to a foreign country, where the whole population are against you and believe they are right, and are struggling for the very doctrines upon which our statutes are based, it becomes a harsh, cruel, and reprehensible act. I differ with the Senator from Ohio when he says he would have a Philippine mother imprisoned seven years if she did not tell on her son, or a Philippine son imprisoned seven years if he did not tell on his mother. I differ with him. He has the answer now.

Mr. FORAKER. What is not too harsh for an American wife or child is not, in my opinion, too harsh for anybody else; but, as I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, he differentiates as to these statutes only because here in this country our statute is not likely to be violated, as he thinks, while over in the Philippines the statute is likely to be violated.

Mr. HOAR. It has also——

Mr. FORAKER. I want to make this speech, if allowed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I do not ask him.

Mr. FORAKER. I will yield presently, but I want to finish these remarks.

In other words, the Senator has no objection to this statute so long as it is dormant, and there is nothing in the conditions to call it into operation or exercise.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator says I have no objection. I have just stated that I did not approve of it, and I do not approve of it anywhere, but it would not do much harm here.

Mr. FORAKER. Notwithstanding all that the Senator from Massachusetts has just said, the effect of what he had already said when I was about to proceed with my speech was that he has no objection to our statute, no active objection, I mean, simply because he thinks there is no likelihood of its being violated.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to suggest to him that the Congress which enacted that statute evidently thought there would be danger of its being violated or it never would have passed it.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to call attention to that. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for calling my attention to it in the way he has. I was about to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that this statute has been on our statute books longer than he has lived. It was enacted in 1790.

It has been here during all his long, distinguished, and honored career in the American Congress in both Houses; it was enacted by the fathers who framed the Constitution of the United States; the fathers who set our Government machinery into operation. It was their idea of what should be the law of this free American Republic in respect to those who might undertake to overturn and destroy it. During all the period the Senator has been here, every day at liberty to offer repealing acts, or amendments, or other statutory provisions, he has never seen fit to raise his hand in a legislative way against this statute.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Now, Mr. President, that being true, what I want to call attention to is that our commissioners, away off in the Philippines, where they have the conditions of war that we have heard so much about in this Chamber during the last few days, when they were undertaking to legislate to protect American interests and American sovereignty and American government, took our statute and followed it, followed it in its text and followed it in its penalties. Therefore it was not warranted, when Senators heard the statute read from the Secretary's desk, for them to rise and complain of it as something unprecedented and unheard of in the legislation of civilized governments. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, recalling to his mind the fact that the Filipinos had gone to war with Spain to throw off tyrannical government and oppression which was unendurable, wherein their condition differs from that of our forefathers who went to war with England under similar conditions?

Mr. FORAKER. I might take a great deal of time to answer that. I do not think it is necessary, however, to take any. I think the Senator himself recognizes that there is a distinction.

Our forefathers struggled for their independence and they secured it, and when they secured it they were a free and independent people, and they legislated as they saw fit.

In the Philippine Islands the people were in insurrection against Spain, it is true, but their insurrection against Spain had nothing whatever to do with our operations in the Philippine Islands. We went to the Philippine Islands, not because we were at war with the Filipinos, but because we were at war with Spain and the Philippine Islands were possessions belonging to Spain. We went to the Philippine Islands and conquered that part of the Spanish territory and took title first by conquest and afterwards in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of peace and upon the payment in the way with which the Senator from South Carolina is familiar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Ohio permit another question?

Mr. FORAKER. Then when our sovereignty was established there, established in such a way as to be recognized by all the world, except the Senator and his political associates, recognized by everybody else all around the globe, then when we were seeking to establish government an insurrection broke out, and, like other insurrections that we know of in the past, it became the duty of the United States Government to suppress it.

It required an army and navy to do it, and we have been employing the Army and the Navy in that behalf, and we owe it to the Army and the Navy, who have been so gallantly and heroically upholding our flag and representing our cause there, to stand here only with words of encouragement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me that any fair-minded person must recognize that France came to the assistance of the American colonists, and that through her instrumentality and aid our fathers won their independence from England. Now, recognizing, as the Senator has asserted, that we did not go to Manila because of the struggles of the Filipinos, still as lovers of liberty I want to ask him if he can not see that the Filipinos occupy even a higher position than our fathers did, for the reason that they had entered upon this struggle and through our assistance as allies they had won their country and owned every foot of it or controlled every foot of it except the city of Manila and the city of Iloilo, as is shown by the official reports of our own officers, when this insurrection of which he speaks broke out and when we forced that battle on Saturday night before the ratification of the treaty, when we had no title to the Philippines, when the purchase for $20,000,000, paid to Spain for something she did not own, had not been completed.

I want to ask him if these people, who are struggling under those conditions, having begun their contest against Spain and now continuing it against us, must be treated as they are intended to be treated by this damnable doctrine which has been promulgated by the Commission?

Mr. FORAKER. In the first place, there is no analogy between the coming into this country in our revolution of the armies of France and the going of our armies into the Philippines; but even if there were, in view of the speech which the Senator from South Carolina has made and the question he has asked, it would be in order for me to ask him on which side of this struggle are his sympathies?

Mr. TILLMAN. My sympathies are with the Filipinos, struggling for their freedom.

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly they are. Everybody knew that, but now we have a flat-footed and unqualified declaration such as, if the Senator were not speaking in his place in the Senate, would make the provisions of the Revised Statutes, in regard to treason, which I have just read, applicable to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not doubt that the Senator would come around to the point where he would accuse me of treason.

Mr. FORAKER. I simply announce what the Senator has declared.

Mr. RAWLINS. In order that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. In order that there may not be undue alarm at the present situation, I will invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the full text of the Constitution of the United States, all of which he did not read:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

This is the part the Senator from Ohio did not read:

> No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not read it, but I called attention to it, the Senator will remember.

Mr. RAWLINS. Let me complete it.

> The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a very celebrated case, which arose when this Constitution was in force and when the statute was in force to which he has alluded. It is the case of The United States vs. Aaron Burr, which came before the most distinguished jurist this country has known, and in a unanimous opinion by that distinguished judge, presiding over the Supreme Court of the United States, it was held that Burr could not be convicted of treason simply for advising resistance to the United States or cooperating with others who advised resistance against the United States, but that there must be an overt act of treason. You will have to stretch the statute and the Constitution far beyond the limits of the boundaries fixed for it by that distinguished judge before you can punish my friend, the Senator from South Carolina, for treason.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the Senator from South Carolina is safe. We could not spare him out of this Chamber. He is of great use and benefit here. He illustrates much that is useful——

Mr. CARMACK. Even though he is a traitor?

Mr. FORAKER. Even though he sympathizes with the Filipinos who are in rebellion against the authority of the United States, and thereby gives aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. What makes them rebels? They were struggling for their independence against Spain when we went there.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio one question.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. And if it be in the least disagreeable to him to answer it, or any part of it, I will withdraw it. Do the people of Ohio, or does the Senator himself, reverence the memory of Thomas Corwin?

Mr. FORAKER. The people of Ohio have a very profound respect for the memory of Thomas Corwin. He was a man of great intellectual endowment. He served his country with great distinction, but Senator Corwin, like some other distinguished Senators I have known, was unfortunate enough in one great emergency of his country to make a profound mistake.

Mr. HOAR. What was the mistake? Perhaps the Senator will answer that or perhaps he will allow me to state.

Mr. FORAKER. The position Mr. Corwin took——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me one sentence.

Mr. FORAKER. The position Mr. Corwin took in regard to the Mexican war.

Mr. HOAR. Senator Corwin said in this body: "If I were a Mexican as I am an American, I would welcome you with bloody hands to hospitable graves." And the people of Ohio, and the Senator from Ohio, I believe, love and honor him because of that brave utterance.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that Mr. Corwin, when he made that speech, was serving in the last official position to which he was ever assigned by the people of Ohio.

Mr. CARMACK. But not the last honorable position he ever held.

Mr. FORAKER. No; he was afterwards sent by the President of the United States as minister to Mexico, but he was never after that utterance honored with the confidence and by the ballots of the people of Ohio; not that they entirely disagreed with him——

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. FORAKER. There were many who sympathized with him, but the people of Ohio as a whole have always been loyal to the Government of the United States, and now when the flag of our country is being borne by our soldiers to battle every man in Ohio will stand behind them to encourage them, and no man can be honored by the voters of that State who discourages them and throws disparagement on that which they are doing.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the majority of the people of Ohio, or at any rate the entire party to which the Senator himself then belonged in Ohio, sympathize with that utterance?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. In so far as they did, the party went out of power.

Mr. HOAR. Well, I know——

Mr. FORAKER. I know——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes——

Mr. HOAR. I will ask but one more question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will subside for one moment.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes that Senators would aid him in securing obedience to the rules of this body. The Chair can not do it himself.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Chair's pardon. I was wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask one more question, and then I will stop.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Do the people of Ohio settle great questions of morals and justice by a show of hands?

Mr. FORAKER. They do by a show of ballots. The people of Ohio need no defense from me. The first settlement came from the State represented by the distinguished Senator. Our establishment of civil government was at Marietta in 1788, and it was by such men as Manasseh Cutler and Rufus Putnam, as good men as this country has ever produced; and from the day that civil government was established at Marietta for the Northwest Territory down to this time the people of Ohio have been standing loyally and faithfully on every occasion by the Government of the United States, and no man who has ever been suspicioned of not so loyally standing has been allowed very long to continue in their representation in any capacity.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from South Carolina referred to the assistance which France rendered to the colonies in the war for independence. We know that under and by virtue of the arrangement made between Benjamin Franklin and the Government of France, France sent its armies to this country and sent its fleets of war. Its armies were welcomed into the midst of the country. Its fleets received free admission into our ports.

Suppose, Mr. President, at the time of the siege of Yorktown the Government of France had negotiated with the Government of Great Britain and paid Great Britain $20,000,000 for the sovereignty of Great Britain over the United States, and then and there, the French soldiers and French fleets being in the midst of the colonies and the colonial ports, those in command of the French army and navy had demanded the submission of the American colonies to the Government of France and had asserted the sovereignty it had bought from Great Britain. What would have been the verdict of the civilized world upon conduct so infamous as that? And there is but little difference, I imagine, between the presence of the army of France and the fleets of France in the colonies and its ports and the presence of the United States with its fleets and its armies in the bay of Manila and in the land of the Philippines.

Mr. FORAKER. Is that all of the Senator's question?

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not say that I was going to ask a question.

Mr. FORAKER. I yielded that the Senator might ask a question. The Senator has given us his view of our situation in the Philippines. I can not undertake to repeat it, but the effect of it is that we are there in such an attitude as that the Filipinos have a right, justly and equitably, and without the commission of any offense against good government or our authority, to drive us out if they can.

Mr. PATTERSON. We were there and are there as allies of the Filipinos.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not further yield, Mr. President, to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. We are there as the French were allies of the American colonies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio refuses to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. For three years we have been debating this question in the halls of Congress and in newspapers, and on all the political stumps throughout the country. Under the leadership of Mr. Bryan it was asserted that the American people had gone into the Philippines as allies of the Filipinos, and that we had treacherously, at the conclusion of the struggle there, overcome them and taken possession of their country and had entered upon a tyrannical rule without regard to their consent.
